Mr. CUMMINS. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I present views of the minority, signed by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and myself, on the bill (S. 6737) to create a court of commerce and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes. I ask that the views of the minority be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that in the same number of the RECORD the report of the majority also be printed, so that the two may go together.

Mr. KEAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the report of the majority has not yet been filed. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is absent.

Mr. CULLOM. It is not quite ready.

Mr. HALE. I think the two had better go together and be printed together, in order that the beauties of each may be better appreciated when the other side is seen. Therefore I hope that the Senator will not ask that the views he presents be printed until we also get the report of the majority, which will be later, I suppose, in the day.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, allow me to say a word. The clerk of the committee has just been to see me. He says he understood that the views of the minority were to wait until the report was made. The chairman of the committee has been called away and he will be back, I understand, to-morrow. He will probably be ready to make the report when he comes. I would suggest, therefore, that it would be best to withhold the views of the minority until the chairman gets back.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Iowa will do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the understanding before the committee was that the views of the minority should be presented on Thursday morning. I agreed to defer submitting them until that time. It was thought when the agreement was made that the majority report would also be ready by Thursday morning. I am sure that upon reflection by members of the committee it will be remembered that there was no agreement that the views of the minority should be deferred until the majority report came in. In fact, I think it was not certain among the members of the majority of the committee at that time whether there would be any other report than the mere formal report recommending the passage of the bill. Senators will remember that that report came in last Friday morning.

With regard to the printing in the RECORD, I have no objection whatever to its being withheld for the day. I would not want to impeach my own report by admitting that it would suffer at all in comparison with the report of the majority of the committee. Therefore, if it is desired that these two instruments shall stand side by side in the RECORD, I will very cheerfully agree to that suggestion.

Mr. HALE. Then let it go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The understanding, then, is that the views of the minority will not be printed in the RECORD until the majority report is presented, and the order will be entered that the two shall be printed in the RECORD together?

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Provided the majority report comes in to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt it will be made very soon after the chairman gets back from New York. He was called there. I think it would be well to wait until he comes back.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that there will be two minority reports. I contemplate filing briefly my views regarding an amendment which I shall offer providing for the national incorporation of great trunk-line railroads. I have arranged with the chairman of the committee that my views shall be published with the report which he is to make. I understood from him that he would not be ready with the report until Saturday. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to state that it will be ready then?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know exactly, although I suppose it was nearly ready before the chairman was called away. However, I am not sure about that. All that I desire is that the views of the minority which the Senator from Iowa submits this morning and asks to have printed may be laid over until the chairman comes, and the Senator will then see him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask that the order which has been requested by the Senator from Iowa, that these reports, when they are presented, shall be printed in the RECORD, include also the minority views which I shall file.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. WARNER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) for the appointment of members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 308) thereon.

Mr. DICK. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It appoints James W. Wadsworth, of New York; Henry E. Palmer, of Nebraska; John M. Holley, of Wisconsin; Henry H. Markham, of California; and Oscar M. Gottschall, of Ohio, as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States; Maj. James W. Wadsworth to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1910; Capt. Henry E. Palmer to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1910; John M. Holley to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1910; Col. Henry H. Markham to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1910; and Oscar M. Gottschall to succeed Gen. Charles M. Anderson, whose term of service would expire April 21, 1912, but who died on December 28, 1908.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask whether there are any changes.

Mr. WARNER. There is no change except in the case of Oscar M. Gottschall, who succeeds Gen. Charles M. Anderson, deceased.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPE FEAR RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6661) in aid of navigation of the Cape Fear River at and below the city of Wilmington, N. C., to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 309) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $21,000 for the better lighting of the Cape Fear River at and below Wilmington, N. C., for the purpose of navigation, and to carry out the project approved by the Light-House Board, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OFFICERS OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 192), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 192.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the names of all officers of the Regular Army now detailed on detached service other than temporary, the report to show the names, rank, regiment, or corps of such officers, and the date of their present assignment to such detached service, and the place and character of the same.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 6910) to provide for the extension of Reno road in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURTON:

A bill (S. 6911) granting an increase of pension to Sebastian Glasstetter;

A bill (S. 6912) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin D. Barton; and

A bill (S. 6913) granting an increase of pension to Levin A. Harvey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 6914) for the relief of certain purchasers of lots in the Fort Crawford military tract at Prairie du Chien, State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 6915) to establish standard packages and grades for apples, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. BURKETT:

A bill (S. 6916) granting an increase of pension to Rufus E. Losee; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DICK:

A bill (S. 6917) granting an increase of pension to George W. Shamel;

A bill (S. 6918) granting an increase of pension to Charles Ball;

A bill (S. 6919) granting an increase of pension to John Cyrus Rinehart; and

A bill (S. 6920) granting an increase of pension to August Frazier (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 6921) to provide for a report upon and a comprehensive map or maps showing the land necessary to be acquired for parks and parkways within the District of Columbia (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 6922) granting an increase of pension to Henry C. Holter;

A bill (S. 6923) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Elliott;

A bill (S. 6924) granting an increase of pension to William C. McEuen;

A bill (S. 6925) granting an increase of pension to John Dugan (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6926) granting an increase of pension to John Neeb (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BEVERIDGE:

A bill (S. 6927) for the purchase of a site and erection thereon of a public building at Washington, Ind.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 6928) granting an increase of pension to John H. Case (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 6929) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey by fee-simple patent certain land within the Otoe and Missouria Reservation, Okla., to the Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 6930) for the relief of William Lewis Bryan; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 6931) to provide for an experiment in the improvement of certain highways by the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the Postmaster-General, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. CRANE:

A bill (S. 6933) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Tallman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 6934) granting a pension to Charles D. Belden (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 6935) to correct the military record of Alonzo Rich (with accompanying papers); to the committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment relative to the appointment and substitution of letter carriers, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS. I submit an amendment relative to the promotion of clerks and carriers at first-class post-offices after June 30, 1910, intended to be proposed by me to the post-office appropriation bill. I ask that the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I move that 1,000 additional copies of the amendment be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the order for the printing of additional copies will be made.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment, proposing to appropriate $1,368 from the funds of the Chickasaw Nation, to be paid to the St. Agnes Academy, of Ardmore, Okla., for board and tuition of Chickasaw children, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for improving St. Lucie Inlet, Florida, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the improvement of Biscayne Bay, Florida, to $15,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for improving Jupiter Inlet, Florida, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment relative to the survey of Dabob Bay, State of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 each for improving the harbors of White Lake and Pentwater, Michigan, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $686,000 for improving Saginaw Bay and River up to the mouth of the Tittabawassee River, Michigan, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

HON. JAMES GORDON.

Mr. MONEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 193), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 193.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to the Hon. James Gordon the sum of $102.74, being the compensation of a Senator of the United States for five days, February 24 to 28, 1910, during which he served as Senator from the State of Mississippi.

Mr. KEAN subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution, reported favorably thereon, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

HANCOCK ROBINSON.

Mr. MONEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 194), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 194.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Hancock Robinson, who served as clerk to Hon. James Gordon, late a Senator from Mississippi, the sum of $25, the same being at the rate of compensation now paid to clerks of Senators, from February 24 to February 28, 1910.

Mr. KEAN subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution, reported favorably thereon, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. PENROSE. I present a summary of the Post-Office Department's reply to the statement of the Periodical Publishers' Association of America regarding second-class mail. I move that the summary be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I think, in view of the agitation and the queries that come to every Senator, there ought to be several thousand extra copies of the document printed, so that we will be able to send it out in answer to the overwhelming demand for information on the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. I have investigated the cost. I believe it would cost about $70 to print 10,000 copies of the statement. I ask unanimous consent that 20,000 additional copies of the statement be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 20,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 410, Sixty-first Congress, second session, "Summary of the department's reply to the Periodical Publishers' Association of America, regarding second-class matter," be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

INTERNATIONAL CROP-REPORTING SERVICE.

Mr. FLINT. I present a report by Dr. Traugott Muller, delegate of the German Empire to the International Institute of Agriculture, relative to the establishment of an international crop-reporting service for the staples of agriculture for 1910–11, and also for the adoption of a uniform method of reporting to the institute information on areas sown, condition of growing crops, and estimates and statements of harvest yields. I move that the report be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 19633. An act to authorize Aransas Pass Channel and Dock Company to construct a bridge across Morris and Cumming Channel; and

H. R. 21221. An act to authorize the city of St. Joseph, Mich., to construct a bridge across Morrison Channel of the St. Joseph River, Michigan.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and, under the unanimous agreement of the Senate, the Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 5876.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the pending amendment to be that presented by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. It is found on page 6 of the new print.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary was about to read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 6, line 10, after the word "situated," it is proposed to strike out the following words:

At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories—

And in lieu thereof to insert:

At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether he interprets this amendment to include losses for moneys loaned to banks?

Mr. CARTER. The intention of the amendment, or the purpose of the Senator in presenting the amendment, I understand, is to provide against losses consequent upon failure of banks or from any other cause.

Mr. BURTON. That is included under the words "the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established?"

Mr. CARTER. "And to provide an adequate reserve," to meet any contingency likely to arise in the course of the operations of the system.

Mr. BURTON. That is the interpretation placed upon this language?

Mr. CARTER. That is my understanding of the meaning.

Mr. BURTON. It is not intended that the Government shall bear losses, but that the amount shall be made good from the rate of interest charged to banks?

Mr. CARTER. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator means that this amendment is designed to create a fund with which losses will be met?

Mr. CARTER. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does the Senator think the language is sufficiently broad to make that clear?

Mr. CARTER. The question of an adequate reserve would involve the consideration of the purposes to which a reserve might properly be applied or for which a reserve would be created. Losses might occur through any one of a variety of ways. If we should insert the words "bank losses," we would thereby exclude losses through embezzlement of funds. If we recapitulated to any considerable extent, the Senator knows that we would exclude those elements not specifically embraced in the recapitulation.

Mr. SHIVELY. Suppose you were to employ the word "losses;" that would not carry you beyond the general purposes of the bill. The word "expenses" seems to me to be very indefinite.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will observe that the amendment contemplates charging a rate of interest which will yield to the fund an amount sufficient to pay the interest the Government is obligated to pay to the depositor at the post-office; also the expenses of administration and other charges connected with the system and to provide an adequate reserve. An adequate reserve would be such an accumulation as prudence might demand to meet contingent losses of any kind. I do not observe that anything would be lost by employing the word, and I do not perceive that anything would be gained.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, in some of the States of New England the laws provide that a savings bank shall not pay above 4 per cent per annum until they have accumulated a 10 per cent reserve. That reserve with us seems to have but one meaning, and that is a fund accumulated out of which may be paid any losses that come through bad investments.

It seems to me that the words "to cover losses by bad debts" would be superfluous in this case. Certainly as the term is construed by bankers generally this covers the exact point that it was designed to reach—that is to say, that the Government shall not be compelled to take from the Treasury of the United States by any special enactment a fund to make good losses which may occur under the provisions of the act.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, then, in any event, as I understand the Senator, this amendment still leaves the United States as the ultimate guarantor of the deposits.

Mr. PAGE. I suppose it must be, because it is the creditor. But the purpose is that in its practice and operation it shall not be compelled to suffer any loss.

The question was raised that possibly the rate of interest the banks would be willing to pay would not be sufficient to cover the expenses and losses. I have taken a little pains to look up the rates of interest paid and the rates of interest paid in the West. I find that even in the State of Utah corporations professing to have a capital of $400,000 are advertising to-day in the magazines of the country that they will pay 6 per cent. In my judgment, if it should be found necessary to charge 2¾ per cent for this fund in order to save the Government harmless from any loss, the banks would probably pay 2¾ per cent.

But, Mr. President, I do not apprehend that any loss will ever come from this fund that will exceed one-tenth of 1 per cent. I think the experience of banks throughout the country is that one-tenth saved or laid aside for a margin of losses would be more than ample. I can not conceive that in any ordinary case there can be losses equal to one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not yet learned the necessity for this special fund. If I comprehend the meaning of this bill, the money does not go into the Treasury of the United States, but it goes into the several banks of the several States. When it is paid out in the way of interest, or when the depositor demands the repayment of the principal and the interest, I understand that that will be paid by a draft upon the bank holding the money received from that vicinity. If I am mistaken in that, I should like to be corrected. If that is true, then there would be no necessity for a special fund to pay losses, because the bill itself provides that—

> Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State or Territory so far as the postal funds on deposit in such State or Territory may be sufficient for the purpose, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor withdrawing resides.

Now, let us suppose that one bank should fail in any one of these States and the depositors in that State would desire to draw out more than the other banks in the State would have money to answer for, still you could go into any other bank in any other State and withdraw a sufficient amount to cover that and to meet any losses that might accrue by reason of such failure. If that is true, what then is the necessity for a special fund that would be 1 per cent, or one-tenth of 1 per cent, or 10 per cent, as some Senators think would be necessary for this special fund?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] will perceive that if the process of payment should continue to the close and business should become hung up, the amount of any losses sustained by reason of the failure of a bank would require a direct call on the Treasury of the United States to make up the deficiency in the last analysis.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that is assuming that we shall close up, and that we shall close up all at one time, which seems to be an impossible contingency.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will see that the infirmity would necessarily exist in any system which did not provide for repairing an actual and absolute loss of capital. There is no fund to be created against which checks will be especially drawn, but there will be created out of accumulated interest and surplus, if you please—perchance the word "surplus" would be better—out of which losses when encountered may be deducted, instead of deducting losses from the capital at hand or invested. The Government goes into this venture without capital, and it must meet all the charges that may come upon the Government in consequence of the postal bank system, by paying out all the money received at the post-offices. If in the deposits in the banks losses are met, such losses will continue until we pay them by some kind of an accumulation. The purpose is to enable the board to so fix the rate of interest charged by the bank as to accumulate some reserve, out of which incidental losses may be made good without invading the capital of the concern.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator right here what becomes of the interest when it is not demanded immediately by the depositor when it is due?

Mr. CARTER. It, of course, continues on deposit in the bank to the credit of the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, there will be so much more in the banks than there was in the beginning?

Mr. CARTER. It increases the deposits.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the interest in the bank itself is constantly making an accumulation, the losses in a single year can be very readily estimated, and the amount of interest for the ensuing year computed upon that; so that you would have your accumulations in the several banks, and not an accumulation in the Treasury itself. I understand that this accumulation is intended to go into the Treasury.

Mr. CARTER. This accumulation is not intended to go into the Treasury, Mr. President. It would simply add to the amount of deposits in the banks.

Mr. McCUMBER. That being the case, it can hardly be said to be what is claimed here—a reserve. It is simply an accumulation, and not a reserve for any particular purpose, except for the purpose of paying the losses. It is not a reserve at all.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, I think it is true that no bank ever carries its reserve in its vaults. A bank may have a 10 per cent reserve perhaps, and that 10 per cent reserve is invested as the capital of the bank or the deposits of the banks are invested. The purpose in this amendment is simply to fix the rate of interest to be paid by the bank sufficient to save the Government from the possibility of any losses growing out of this transaction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the amendment were amended by adding after the word "established," in line 20, the words "and an accumulation to meet any losses," then it would express just exactly what the Senator has in mind, but it gives the idea here of a reserve fund to be deposited somewhere, when, in fact, it is not a reserve fund; it is a reserve for no particular purpose any more than is all the rest of the fund to pay the principal and the interest, and the designation "reserve fund" seems to be wholly inapplicable.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] a question as to his understanding of the words in section 8, "solvent bank or banks, whether organized under national or state law," and so forth. I understand that includes savings banks.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think, fairly construed, the words "bank or banks," as used in the text, would include savings banks and likewise trust companies doing a banking business, but, through an abundance of caution, the Senator from New Hampshire suggested the propriety of an amendment at the close of that section providing that the term "bank," as herein used, should be held to embrace savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business. That amendment, I think, will be presented later by the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. As it read, it seemed to me to include savings banks.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I think it would include them.

Mr. LODGE. But there is no harm in being explicit.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact, as he will notice, that in drafting this substitute he has put in the uniformity provision after the minimum rate. As the amendment was originally drawn—I practically drew that amendment, I will say—it provided:

At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

That is the way it was originally drawn. Now it reads:

At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

I suggest to the Senator that he ought to put this uniformity clause after the provision with reference to interest.

Mr. CARTER. I refer the Senator from Nebraska to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], who drew the amendment which we are now considering.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, replying to the interrogatory of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT], I would refer him to the language of his amendment. He will observe that the phrase, in line 10, is:

At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent.

Then he interjects a clause there, which refers to something besides interest, and goes down to line 13, where it reads:

Which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

It seemed to me that it was better language to say "at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and the reserve." It is a question that is absolutely immaterial; but I am inclined to like the language of the new clause better, and I think the Senator from Nebraska will also on reflection.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not like that language better. After the Senator reads it, interprets it, and explains it, I presume perhaps he thinks it means the same thing, but I doubt it very much. He is going to have his minimum rate uniform. That is provided absolutely; the words used provide for that. I think we ought to define what the minimum and maximum is going to be, and then put in a provision "which rate, in any event"—whether it is minimum or whether it is maximum—"which rate, in any event, shall be uniform." That is the point I am trying to get at. I do not want this board to establish a uniform minimum rate, and then in some way or other make a maximum rate that shall be different in one State from what it is in another State. I want the rate, whether it is minimum or maximum, whether it be 2¼ or 2¾ per cent, or whatever it may be, to be the uniform rate which they shall make and charge. That is the reason I drew the amendment as I did.

The way it is written now is:

Not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

That is, the minimum rate. Now, it goes on and says:

Nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges of the system herein established.

We are providing that each State shall be a jurisdiction to itself so far as the payment of its deposits are concerned. Suppose in case it might be construed that in making this rate Iowa ought to take care of itself, that Idaho ought to take care of itself, that New England ought to take care of itself, then they would reason that Congress only intended that this minimum rate should be uniform; that it should not be less than that anywhere throughout the country, but that each State should take care of its own rate for the purpose of paying interest and losses to the reserve.

Now, of course, as the Senator from Vermont explains it, it means exactly what I want it to mean; but it does seem to me that if you put the uniformity clause after the provision for the minimum and maximum rate, you remove any possibility of making it questionable.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURKETT. I do.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Nebraska an amendment, striking out the word "which" and inserting the words "provided that the rate established shall be uniform." Would not that meet his views?

Mr. BURKETT. It seems to me that it would make it more certain and more euphonious just to say "at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest," and so forth, "which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories." Then you have absolutely established it. There would not be any doubt about it, and you would not need to put in any other provision.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, it is almost impossible to establish at a given time a rate of interest which is going to meet these exigencies and expenses. No one can estimate in the early stages the expenses of running the system. It might require a very high rate of interest as the minimum.

Mr. BURKETT. That is true. If the Senator please, I realize that, but whatever the rate is it ought to be uniform.

Mr. BULKELEY. That is the very thing which I had in mind in inserting instead of the word "which," the words "provided that the rate established shall be uniform."

Mr. BURKETT. You can not do so if you inject those words between the provision for the minimum rate and the provision for the maximum rate, because there will always be those who will contend that those words refer only to what has gone before rather than to what comes after, but if after providing both for the minimum and maximum you say "the charge shall always be uniform throughout the several States and Territories," you escape any question.

Mr. BULKELEY. I should like to ask the Senator what maximum rate he would establish that he thinks would be sufficient to cover the expenses and losses of conducting this business? I do not think anybody has any idea as to that.

Mr. BURKETT. Of course, we are not disputing on that particular point now. I do not know myself that I want to say just what the rate ought to be. My impression is that a quarter of a cent will very adequately take care of it. I think it would be safe to start out at 2½ per cent, but it does not make any difference what it is if it be uniform. I do not want to leave any doubt that anybody can make it otherwise than uniform.

Mr. PAGE. The point raised by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY] is another point altogether. The question between the Senator from Nebraska and myself is one that is absolutely unimportant, but if he prefers the phraseology he has suggested let it be so changed, and we will not make any more words about it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BURKETT. That would make it absolutely unquestionable.

Mr. BULKELEY. It strikes me that the point I endeavored to make goes exactly to the question that is now pending. The incidental question came in as to whether the minimum rate or the maximum rate that might be established would be sufficient to cover the items referred to in the pending amendment. To my mind it is immaterial whether or not the maximum rate is established.

Mr. BURKETT. Then, Mr. President, agreeably to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, I move to amend the amendment by striking out in line 16, the words "which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories," and adding those words at the end of the amendment in line 21.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Transpose the words "which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories," so as to come in after the word "reserve," at the end of the proposed amendment before the period.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withhold his amendment for a moment. I intend to offer one striking out the last six words of the amendment. It might make a difference.

Mr. BURKETT. My amendment would come in at the end. The Senator is not going to move to strike out the provision with reference to the maximum and minimum, is he?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, the words "which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories" would come in at the end anyway. I will, however, withhold the amendment if the Senator desires.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest that the Senator offer his amendment at the close of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BURKETT. I do. I think that was the way it was stated by the Secretary, if I remember—at the close of the pending amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary so stated the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is the Senator going to make that motion now?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope he will, because I wish to vote for it. I agree that there is no occasion whatever for having those last words in the bill. That is what I have been trying to explain. The word "charges" covers everything; and if there was any possibility about it not covering everything, we could say "charges and losses;" but the country to-day, or some portions of it, have the idea from this wording that we are creating a reserve fund that may be moved to some other section of the country. I do not want them to get that idea, because I do not believe that is what is understood here, and it is not necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move to amend——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska withdraw his amendment? Otherwise the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is not in order. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, being an amendment to an amendment, must be disposed of first.

Mr. BURKETT. If my amendment were adopted, then the amendment of the Senator from Iowa might be offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If it were; but it has not been.

Mr. BURKETT. I thought it had been adopted. If it is necessary, on account of the parliamentary situation, I will withdraw it, certainly; but there is no objection to it, as I understand, and I thought it could be adopted, and then the amendment would be open to amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment is in order, and is the only thing in order, unless the Senator from Nebraska withdraws it.

Mr. BURKETT. I will withdraw it, if it is necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not necessary, except to allow the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to be presented.

Mr. BURKETT. Then let us have it voted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I now move to strike from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont the following words, which are in lines 20 and 21, on page 6 of the reprinted bill, "and to provide an adequate reserve." I do not differ in any degree from the Senator from Vermont in regard to the object he desires to accomplish. It will be understood that this——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. What I want to do is to reach a certain end, and I think the remark of the Senator is so fair that if I can meet his view I shall be glad to do it. I suggest, to meet his view, that, after the words "other charges," we add the words "or losses," and then leave out the provision for an adequate reserve. In either case I wish to provide for losses, and that is all I care to do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am entirely willing to withdraw my amendment, if the Senator from Vermont will change his in the manner he has just suggested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa, then, for the time being, withdraws his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont offers an amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 19, after the word "charges," insert the word "losses"——

Mr. CUMMINS. And strike out the remainder of the amendment, I assume.

Mr. CARTER. Strike out all after the word "established" in the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. After the word "losses," as it would read when amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the words that were inserted on motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT].

Mr. CARTER. The portion to be stricken out, as I understand, is, after the word "established," the words "and to provide an adequate reserve."

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "charges," at the end of line 19, it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting the words "or losses;" and in lines 20 and 21, by striking out the words "and to provide an adequate reserve."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it is certainly a novel proposition to carry on the banking business without any reserve. This bill provides for carrying on the business of banking by the United States on an enormous scale, receiving very large amounts in the way of deposits and placing those deposits in banks which may number 22,000. It is useless for us to ignore the fact that such business must be attended by losses; and, if not by losses, by seasons in which it will be extremely difficult to make this money, so widely scattered, immediately available for the payment of the claims of depositors. There is no clearly expressed provision in the bill, so far as I can see, for any liability on the part of the United States Government. An adequate reserve should be provided, not only for a proper conduct of the business, but also to meet losses and those occasions when there may be delays in payment by the banks.

Mr. President, this proposal for a postal savings-bank system illustrates one reason for the criticism of Congress by the public. It demonstrates the difference between a general proposition and a mature, detailed, well-finished product of legislation. Party platforms express general ideas, but legislators have the responsibility of testing their value and giving them definite shape and form. The demand for a postal savings bank rests on some very excellent grounds, such as the encouragement of thrift and the provision of a safe depository for money, but I question very much whether it is practicable as an enterprise or system under the control of a central government, except in countries where the amount of the national debt exceeds the probable aggregate amount of all the deposits.

When you must add to your plan under which deposits are to be made another under which the funds must be invested in the manner contemplated in this bill you go, in my judgment, beyond the legitimate scope of governmental activity and introduce such elements of danger and complication that the plan will not prove successful.

Perhaps the members of the committee having this bill in charge have done the best they could under the circumstances, with due regard for the demands that are made; but, Mr. President, it is my opinion that the proper plan to pursue would have been to have this bill make provision for the investment of the depositors' money in government securities, and, if the amount of such securities available for purchase is not sufficient, providing an option between state, county, and municipal bonds on the one hand, and loans to banks upon the security of state, county, and municipal bonds as well as government bonds on the other hand. In that way all question as to the constitutionality of this measure would have been removed, because the postal savings bank would be an agency for carrying a part, or possibly the whole, of the national debt. As the bill now stands it is sought to inject an amendment providing that, in case of war or emergency, these funds can be withdrawn from the banks and used for the purchase of government bonds. It would seem that there is more or less of the makeshift about that amendment.

In order to give the bill an element of constitutionality and relieve it from this objection, we introduce a provision for an emergency, which it is not expected will arise; and if it does arise, it is not expected that advantage will be taken of it.

Some days since I spoke here in regard to the proposed plan for investing the money. In addition to some objections mentioned then, there are other criticisms which lie to this bill. In the first instance there is a provision that the money shall be deposited in national banks or state banks subject to national or state supervision and examination. In the first place, this is an injustice to national and other banks which must provide a reserve, the injustice of which is very plain, because if there is a bank which must reserve 10, 15, or 25 per cent, or any portion of its deposits, it can not afford to pay the same rate of interest as another bank which need maintain no reserve.

But from the standpoint of the Government that bank which can borrow this money to the greatest advantage is likely to be less stable and not in a position to respond so promptly to the demands of its creditors or depositors.

There is another feature which deserves comment. There are all kinds of laws in the different States in regard to supervision. What does supervision mean? Does it mean strictness or laxity?

Under the provision in this bill, if they file a statement once a year and an examiner goes around and makes the most superficial examination of a bank, it is eligible to receive funds. It is just as eligible as a bank which is subjected to the most rigid system of frequent examination by competent bank examiners; it is just as eligible to receive funds as is one which is governed and controlled by the most conservative rules regulating the amount of money that it shall lend to any one borrower.

Then, we come to another phase of the plan. This money is to be secured by the banks by giving bonds of indemnity. This is certainly a new kind of banking. Bonds of indemnity are usually given to secure the honesty of an official or a trustee in the performance of his trust. They are not given to secure an obligation for the payment of a loan. The amounts due upon them are not immediately available. Realization might depend upon a long course of litigation. A great many experiments have been made in banking; for instance, one under which circulating notes were secured by mortgages on real estate. Some years ago in one of the States of the Union this was conceived to be a splendid plan. They thought what is more stable security than the soil? What is better than a real-estate mortgage? But nearly every bank that secured the payment of its notes of issue by real-estate mortgages failed. Why did they fail? Because there could not be that prompt realization which was necessary to meet the demands upon them.

The banking business requires liquid assets—immediate payment—something on which the banker or one who is compelled to meet any obligation can immediately place his hands. Government bonds would meet this demand; state, county, or municipal bonds would meet this demand, because there can be an immediate realization upon them in the market.

More than this, the pending bill provides that, at the option of the bank, collateral security may be deposited in the place of indemnity bonds, giving the option to any bank in localities far removed from the capital to say to these trustees: "We demand this money; we are entitled to it, because we are in the locality where the deposits were made. It is ours. We will not give you bonds of indemnity, but we will give you collateral security." Just think of it! There are over 20,000 banks in this country which can receive deposits under these provisions. What an amount of examination it would entail; what a certainty of mistake there would be if over this entire area these trustees are compelled to transact all this business.

It has been alleged here, with great confidence, that the losses will not be more than one-tenth of 1 per cent. I would that I could believe it. I would I could believe that under a system of banking—for, I repeat, that is what it is—which involves these widespread transactions, the lending out of money everywhere over this great country, the losses will not be more than one-tenth of 1 per cent. It was not so in the old days of the pet banks in the times of the Jackson administration, when the Government made deposits with different banks. At that time so many of them failed that the Government was hampered in its fiscal operations.

It is true we are to-day on more solid ground in our financial transactions, but I can not believe that the losses would be limited to any such trivial amount as that mentioned.

It is possible that this plan, if adopted, would be managed for years without any serious loss, but in time of stress or of panic, when banks are suspending and failing, it is impossible under these regulations to avoid frequent and serious losses.

But even suppose the losses were not to occur, has anyone comprehended the amount of labor that is required to carry out the provisions of this bill? That is, if you make your examinations with any thoroughness. Every time a collateral note is received, whether it be in Maine, in Oregon, or in Texas, there ought to be an examination into the value of that note. What a small army of officials—and they should be men of ability and discernment—will be required to transact all that business.

I must say, Mr. President, that I regret that the bill is not in another form. I do not wish to indulge in unfavorable prognostications about it, but the criterion should be, is this the best plan? If we go into this new field of enterprise we should go into it with careful and wise provision of the plan we adopt; and this I am sure is not the best.

A great many people think that the banking business is very simple; that almost any amateur can engage in it, but the efforts of those unskilled in the business have been marked by wrecks and suffering all along the way. Lord Overstone, the British financier, said that genius was the very worst quality in a bank cashier or in bank management; that adherence to settled methods and to the beaten paths were the qualities most required in banking. I fear, Mr. President, there is too much genius in this bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] objects to the provision of the bill which authorizes a bank to deposit collateral security, to be approved by the trustees, to guarantee the repayment of money deposited in the bank. Suffice it to say that every dollar of the Government's money deposited in a bank in the United States to-day is deposited under that identical arrangement, and no loss has ever been encountered.

Mr. BURTON. What do I understand the Senator from Montana to say?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana stated and reasserts that every dollar of government money deposited in a bank in the United States to-day, or at any time in the past, has been secured by collateral deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but what is that collateral, may I ask?

Mr. CARTER. That collateral is collateral approved by the Treasury Department.

Mr. BURTON. Ah! government bonds.

Mr. CARTER. Not at all. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BURTON. For a time an arrangement was made by which state, county, and municipal bonds could be deposited.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly; and they can be deposited to-day in the first instance. Of course there is a difference between the circulation of the country and deposits of government money in banks. The circulation can only be secured by bonds of the United States, but our deposits in the United States depositories are secured by collateral consisting, in part, of government bonds; in some cases wholly so, perchance; but consisting, if the party elects, of any kind of bonds accepted in New England as an investment for savings-bank funds or approved by the law of New York as a proper investment for savings-bank funds; and beyond that, state bonds and a variety of railroad bonds. I think they have accepted railroad bonds to the extent of millions upon millions within the last few years.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Montana will excuse me for interrupting; at any rate I do not understand that the Treasury as security for its deposits accepts notes, bills receivable. This does make provision for just that very class of securities. That is what collateral means here. If it means anything, it means that from all these banks you will take notes given in that locality, drafts discounted, and securities of that nature, while under present arrangements it is practically confined—I think absolutely—to government and, maybe, other bonds—state, county, municipal, and perhaps railroad.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAMBLE in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I would suggest that not only does the Government receive bonds of the various classes referred to for security of deposits, but the Government also takes indemnity bonds for certain classes of deposits.

Mr. CARTER. I think that may be considered as settled, practically.

One word more in reference to the Senator's suggestion that we are turning over this business, which may reach large proportions, to inexperienced postal officials. I admit it is quite probable that we will have as much as two hundred millions of deposits made the first year. What of it? These deposits will be made with the postmasters of the country, who are now handling over seven hundred millions of cash each year—this year two hundred and twenty millions—of the ordinary postal receipts, four hundred and ninety odd millions of money-order money, making more than $700,000,000 being handled by these identical agents. Is the system likely to break down by adding $100,000,000 more, or $200,000,000? If these people are competent to handle $700,000,000, and that, too, without loss or confusion, may they not, with equal facility, handle $800,000,000 or $900,000,000? I think so.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I was quite unable to hear the colloquy which went on upon the other side of the Chamber, and I would ask that we be informed what is the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment, at the end of line 19, on page 6, after the word "charges," insert the words "or losses;" and in line 21, at the end of the proposed amendment, strike out the words "and to provide an adequate reserve," so that if amended it will read:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges or losses of the system herein established, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I find there is a good deal of difference of opinion in regard to the amendment in question. I assented to it because I wished to facilitate an early vote upon the bill, but, with the consent of the Senator from Iowa, I wish to withdraw the amendment—it was my amendment—and that will leave the matter where I suppose the Senator from Iowa will move that the last six words of the amendment, "and to provide an adequate reserve," be stricken out.

Mr. CARTER. Withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his amendment.

Mr. CARTER. To the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no power to assent to the withdrawal of the amendment, but I have no disposition to interpose any objection to its withdrawal. I await the determination of the Senator from Vermont and of the Senate with regard to the proposed amendment in order to determine my own course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the amendment proposed be modified as will be indicated.

The SECRETARY. That it be withdrawn.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this is the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and that he himself has an undoubted right to modify it. I think that is the universal practice of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can it be withdrawn after it is in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. No. He is not withdrawing it. He is modifying the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand him——

Mr. LODGE. He modified it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To make a formal withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. He modified it at first by proposing to strike out the last words and to put in the words "or losses" after "charges." Now he further modifies it by restoring it to its original form, and a Senator has a right to modify an amendment which he himself has offered.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I wished to be entirely fair with the Senator from Iowa, and so I sent out and asked him to come in. I would not be guilty of any discourtesy to him. But I understood he was willing that I should withdraw my amendment for the purpose of permitting him to introduce his amendment to strike out the last six words of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as now proposed to be modified by the Senator from Vermont will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Vermont now withdraws the words added after the word "charges," the words "or losses."

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont be read as it will read if those words are stricken out.

The SECRETARY. So that it will read:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I now renew the motion I made for the proposal of the Senator from Vermont to strike out from this amendment, in lines 20 and 21, the words "and to provide an adequate reserve."

Mr. KEAN. Why does not the Senator propose a substitute for it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not quite finished. I do not believe it is necessary to substitute anything for it; and in order that the matter may be before the Senate in precisely the form in which it was debated under the proposal of the Senator from Vermont, I ask in my motion the insertion of the words "and losses" at the close of line 19 and immediately after the word "charges."

I did not intend, Mr. President, at this moment to discuss this matter, but inasmuch as it has arisen I think we ought to have a little clearer understanding of it and of the effect of this provision than some of us seem to have.

The amendment originally proposed by the Senator from Vermont is intended only to fix a minimum and a maximum rate of interest. It does not deal with the deposits in the banks as such. It prescribes a minimum rate of interest, 2½ per cent per annum. It is believed by those who are familiar with the subject that one-fourth of 1 per cent per annum will fully cover all the expenses of administration and such losses or charges as may fall upon the system.

I have not yet heard a Senator suggest that the addition of one-fourth of 1 per cent per annum will not abundantly cover every contingency with which this system is confronted. But it was suggested when the matter was formerly before the Senate that we ought to have ample authority in the board of trustees to require a little more than 2½ per cent if it should become necessary to do so. Those of us who believe that this money should remain in the banks of the United States, deposited under the terms of this bill, instantly saw in that suggestion a full and free reign on the part of the board of trustees to fix the rate of interest at a point which would render it impossible for any of the banks to pay the rate, with the result that the money would at once be withdrawn from the banks and used, as the bill then was, either to buy the bonds of the United States or to invest in other securities that were named in the bill.

I believe there has been from the beginning in the minds of a great many people—and I do not criticise that motive at all, because undoubtedly those people believe they are doing the best thing for the country—a determination to inject into this bill something that would enable the board of trustees to overthrow and destroy the policy of depositing these moneys in the banks and to bring them to Washington for investment in national bonds or to send these moneys to other financial centers for investment in a variety of securities named in the bill. Therefore those of use who desire to keep this money in the communities in which it is collected, namely, in the banks, so long as they are willing to pay a fair rate of interest on it, do not want anything in this bill that will enable the board of trustees to prescribe a rate of interest that will have the effect of withdrawing the deposits from the banks.

My objection to the words I have moved be stricken from the bill—namely, "and to provide an adequate reserve"—is that they furnish the board of trustees no definite criterion. I know the Senator from Vermont does not intend that those words shall be so construed as to nullify the real purpose of the bill, but will any Senator here during this debate advise the Senate of the meaning of "an adequate reserve," as connected with the system that we are about to establish? Tell me what will be included within the term "an adequate reserve." Reserve for what? Reserve to pay the depositors who gradually will enlarge themselves into an army? A reserve that will be sufficient in the ordinary banking sense to discharge and protect the obligations? If that is the purpose, if that is the sort of reserve that is sought to be created here, then this board, in fixing the maximum rate of interest, would necessarily fix it so high that there would not be a bank in the United States that could afford to pay it.

That is not the intention of the Senator from Vermont. That I know. His intent, as explained many times, is simply to enlarge the rate of interest to that point where it will meet all the charges and expenses and losses of the system. I think the word "charges" fully covers every obligation which could be or ought to be discharged out of this fund. But for perfect protection to the fund and to the system I am willing that the word "losses" shall be inserted in the proviso. But I am not willing that there shall be used in this bill words the meaning of which no Senator will be able to give; at least there will be no concurrence among Senators as to the meaning of those words. The reserve required of the national banks by law is one thing. The reserve required by state laws governing state banks is quite another thing, or at least it varies in the several States of the Union.

Now, until somebody can rise and tell the Senate what these words mean, what definition will be put upon them by the board of trustees, and until it is seen that the meaning so attached to the words will not permit the prescription of a rate of interest that will destroy the very purpose of the bill, I shall insist that the words be stricken out. We may as well face the real question at this time as at any other. We want—some of us do, at least—a bill that will put it beyond the power of the board of trustees to fix an arbitrary rate of interest that will have the effect of withdrawing this money from the banks in which it is to be deposited. I am not only willing, but I shall insist, that the rate of interest be fixed at a point that will make this system self-sustaining. I want nothing in this proviso or in any other that can be used to withdraw these moneys from the banks so long as the banks are willing to pay a fair and a reasonable rate of interest upon them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment, at the end of line 19, after the word "charges," insert the words "or losses;" and in lines 20 and 21 strike out the words "and to provide an adequate reserve."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is detained by illness. Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). On the pending amendment I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. BURROWS (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is unavoidably absent on account of sickness.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DEPEW (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. DEPEW. I have a general pair with that Senator. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BACON. Upon all amendments and upon the bill itself I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. RAYNER. I will state that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Maryland] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] on the amendments and on the bill.

Mr. DEPEW. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] and vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who has been thoughtful enough to release me from it by telegraph. I feel at liberty to vote on the final passage of the bill, but for the moment I hesitate about voting on amendments in his absence. I believe at this point at least I will withhold my vote.

Mr. BAILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to make an announcement so that it may go into the RECORD. When a vote was taken on an amendment this morning, I announced that I was paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], but that I had been released from that pair in order that I might vote on the final passage of the bill. My attention having been diverted for the moment, I had not heard the statement of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the effect that his colleague [Mr. SMITH of Maryland] was paired on the bill and all amendments with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I had myself been a party to the arrangement which paired the Senator from Maryland with the Senator from West Virginia, but I did not feel at liberty to pair him with respect to the amendments.

I make this statement so that it may correct what appears to be a contradiction in the RECORD as it now stands.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DANIEL] is detained by sickness. On this bill and all amendments to it he is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—38.

Bankhead	Cummins	Jones	Shively
Beveridge	Davis	La Follette	Simmons
Borah	Dixon	McCumber	Smith, S. C.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] as amended.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest that if the words "and to provide an adequate reserve" are omitted, clearly the words "or losses" are required at the end of line 19. It is the very obvious intent of the provision.

Mr. CARTER. I understood that that was a part of the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was a part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana is quite right. That was a part of my amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as amended. The amendment as amended will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, after the word "situated," strike out the words:

At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more that is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

And in lieu of those words insert:

At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges or losses of the system herein established, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator who offered this amendment. Should he not employ the words "throughout the United States and its Territories" instead of the words "throughout the several States and Territories?" The Senator will observe that the language employed in the Constitution, wherever a rule of uniformity is prescribed, is "throughout the United States," not "throughout the several States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana propose that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. SHIVELY. I offered the words in suggestion to the Senator from Montana. I now propose them as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he is quite certain as to the constitutional phraseology. My impression is that where uniformity is referred to it refers to "the several States."

Mr. SHIVELY. The reverse is true. If the Senator from Montana will examine, he will find that both in fixing the rule of uniformity in taxation and fixing the rule of uniformity in naturalization, the words "the United States" instead of the words "the several States" are used. The word "several" is objectionable on other grounds than that a different phrase is employed in the Constitution. But the constitutional phrase obviates all objections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as amended will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "several" before the word "States," and to insert in lieu the word "United," and also to insert the word "its" before "Territories," so as to read "the United States and its Territories."

Mr. CARTER. I doubt if the Senator means that. At least it would bring some confusion into the law. The Territory and possessions of the United States may be regarded as interchangeable terms. The word "Territories" may mean a legal organization, commonly called a "Territory," as formed under the ordinance of 1787. It might mean a stretch of country if otherwise applied. It seems that the words "United States" would cover it. I think the Senator will find that the language as it is framed in the bill is right.

Mr. SHIVELY. I still insist on the amendment to the amendment. The amendment as amended should, in the respect to which I address my amendment, read as follows:

Throughout the United States and its Territories.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, my impression is that the bill in other particulars does provide for Territories or districts. I think you will find that your own bill is so constructed. The Senator from Indiana is undoubtedly right, and that will need attention.

Mr. CARTER. The bill of course relates to all the territory in which post-offices of a given character may be located.

Mr. BAILEY. For instance, I will just turn to the bill here. In line 9, on page 2, it says:

Receiving deposits of postal savings in each State and Territory.

Undoubtedly it provides for the Territories. I have no doubt that somewhere in the bill it is provided that they may be established in the District of Columbia and probably in the far-away possessions of the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. CARTER. At the conclusion of section 8 the word "Territory" as used in the bill is defined to be "held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone." I shall later move——

Mr. BAILEY. Then all that you need do would be to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana and say "the United States and the Territories thereof;" the Territories being defined in another section. But the United States is the Government and not the country as defined in the Constitution. As the Senator from Indiana has well said, the rule of uniformity which the Constitution prescribes for taxation is that all imposts, duties, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. Still I think it is probably true that that would bind the Congress as to the District. I have no doubt it has been so decided, but at this moment I do not recall it. However, as you are dealing with the Territories separate and apart, and as you define them, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana a very sensible one.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator's substitution of the term "United States" for the words "several States" is made, of course it would be necessary to say "and the Territories thereof;" but I do not see any need of amendment at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana is correct. But it seems to me that we might obviate the difficulty by changing the phraseology somewhat and let the amendment read, instead of as it now appears here, "at a uniform rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum," and strike out the words "which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories." I ask the Senator from Indiana will not that cover it?

Mr. SHIVELY. Would not that be omitting the rule of uniformity entirely?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I think not. My proposition is to insert the word "uniform" after the article "a," in line 14, so that it will read:

> At a uniform rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

It seems to me that would cover the question and obviate the difficulty with which we are now dealing.

Mr. SHIVELY. In that we would not be as careful in the use of language in preparing legislation as were the makers of the Constitution. When they wanted to establish a uniform rate they were careful to say "throughout the United States."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is true, but we will have to add something to this phraseology if we say "throughout the United States."

Mr. SHIVELY. And the Territories.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the Territories or the districts. It seems to me we have the most comprehensive expression if we insert the words I have indicated, so that it will read "at a uniform rate of interest." There can be no doubt as to the meaning of that.

Mr. SHIVELY. I still think that we ought to have what shall constitute a clear rule fully expressed in the legislation. Employing the words which have been suggested, modified so as to read, "throughout the United States and the Territories thereof," gives a rule of uniformity that will exclude all doubt.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the opinion of the Senator from Indiana, would that include the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHIVELY. It would include it as much as any other part of the bill includes it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If we insert the word "uniform," and simply provide that the interest shall be at a uniform rate, then it seems to me that there can be no question that the rate must be uniform in every place where the deposit is accepted. It is comprehensive, and it seems to me perfectly clear. If that amendment is in order, I will move it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. I submit, Mr. President, that an amendment to an amendment to an amendment is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment in the third degree is not in order.

Mr. SHIVELY. I make the point that an amendment to the amendment is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SHIVELY. And the Senator's amendment is not in order. If the Senator will give me his attention for a moment he will note the conclusion of section 8 of the bill:

> For the purposes of this act the word "Territory," as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

The language I propose prescribes a perfect rule of uniformity, while the words I have just read obviate the difficulty which the Senator from Utah suggested.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I rather think it enforces the suggestion I have made. I am not certain that we have included every place there in which these postal depositories can be established. At any rate, it seems to me clear that by inserting the word "uniform" we will cover the whole subject.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, nothing could very much better illustrate the folly and injustice of this kind of legislation. You prescribe for the Government a rule that does not exist anywhere in the United States where men are allowed to make their own contracts. You prescribe that money shall be worth exactly the same rate of interest in the great centers, where there is a plethora of it, as it is in those distant and sparsely settled sections, where the banks can take it in and then loan it out at a rate double what the banks will pay or what the banks can receive in sections differently situated.

The people of our State are not in a position to complain, because it is a rather novel and very remarkable experience to find that the Government fixes the same rate of interest in Texas, where we need so much money to develop our wonderful resources, as it fixes in Massachusetts, where they have already developed their resources.

I suppose it would come with bad grace from us to complain, but it still proves beyond question that the banks that must pay the same rate in Texas that other banks pay in Massachusetts can loan this money out for almost twice as much as they can command for it in the State of Massachusetts. Therefore, under your system the banks in Texas will make double as much off of their customers as the banks in Massachusetts would make. You have established arbitrarily a condition which has no justification, because the value of money is not the same throughout the United States either as to its purchasing power or as to its rate of interest, but in this case it happens to accord with our condition better than the old one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana to the pending amendment of the Senator from Vermont as amended.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, it has been suggested here, and I think there is some force in it, that it will probably improve the language of the amendment to say "the United States and the Territories thereof," rather than "the United States and its Territories." I wish to perfect my amendment to the amendment by those words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment as perfected will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. PAGE. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 17, strike out the words "several States and Territories" and in lieu insert the words "United States and the Territories thereof."

Mr. CARTER. It must be borne in mind that that portion of the amendment has been transposed so it will not appear in line 17, but at a later point.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as amended.

Mr. SHIVELY. I hope the amendment may be again read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 6, line 10, after the word "situated," by striking out the words:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum nor more than reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

And in lieu of those words to insert:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges or losses of the system herein established, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and the Territories thereof.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the committee if in executing this provision it is expected that the authorities will take into account what must be the inevitable increase in operating the Post-Office Department in consequence of additional employees? I think myself that would be the cost of operating the system, but the difficulty in applying it is that there is no special provision which would enable anybody to separate the expenses of the post-offices at which the deposits are received.

Mr. President, unless I am mistaken, before this bill is put into successful operation, certainly before it has been operated very long, it will call for an additional post-office force of 50,000 men. That probably sounds like an astounding statement, but there are something like 50,000 post-offices to which the bill applies and can be made to apply. When you impose upon those offices the duty of keeping bank accounts—not only keeping an account with their depositors, but also keeping an account with the banks—you must either add an additional employee to those now in those offices or else the employees in those offices are now doing very much less work than they ought to do.

But so far as my experience goes, nearly everybody in every office is trying to get more clerical help. Nobody that I know of dismisses any, and I venture to say that an examination of the Post-Office Department's files will show that there is a constant application, even as the matter now stands, for additional help.

If that is true, how much will that help cost? Certainly upon an average of not less than $900 a year for each employee, because a man who is competent to do this work must be something of a bookkeeper. As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] says, you can not get a man who is a capable bookkeeper for $75 a month, or $900 a year. I agree with him; but that is certainly the lowest of salaries at which you could expect to get such men. If you are going to have a man at every post-office to keep these books, you will need 50,000 additional employees, and at $900 a year—and that is the minimum—it means an increased expenditure of $45,000,000 annually. Does this bill intend to provide for that?

Mr. President, to propose any system which adds 50,000 employees to the pay roll of the Government should arrest our attention, and then to propose one that will add $45,000,000 to the expenses of the Post-Office Department, in which there is already a deficit——

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BRADLEY. Does the Senator from Texas not mean $4,500,000?

Mr. BAILEY. I think not. Fifty thousand men, at $10 each, would be $500,000 a year. Now, multiply that by 90, and I think you will have $45,000,000. My arithmetic may be at fault, but I think it is not. I think that 50,000 men, at a salary of $900 a year, will amount to the stupendous sum of $45,000,000—not stupendous in this day, but, Mr. President, it is within 75 per cent of what the entire cost of the Government aggregated in 1860. Yet now we impose an additional expense of $45,000,000, without knowing whether it is $45,000,000 or $4,500,000, and the chairman of the committee is waiting until the Senator from Kentucky figures it out before he ventures an opinion on it. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I myself have no doubt that when this bill is put into operation it means 50,000 additional employees, or else if we can do this additional work with the force we now have they have been cheating the Government. If the force we now have has been fully occupied, then the force we must have must be increased by at least an additional man at every one of these post-offices. When you reflect that you pay a rural mail carrier and a local mail carrier something like $900 a year, when you come to get your competent bookkeepers you will pay them very much more.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. In addition to this added force in the Post-Office Department, will we not necessarily have a large force in Washington or at some other central point to look after this matter?

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. GALLINGER. And a very large force, in all human probability.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. Surely they are going to require the postmasters to report to the Post-Office Department at Washington or to this commission; and if this commission do not have the information before them, I am at a loss to understand how they could faithfully and intelligently perform their duties.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator will permit me, the Government here at Washington will not only have to keep an account with each post-office with regard to each depositor, but also with each deposit bank and with each individual depositor. Will it not have to keep at least three sets of accounts?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly, if it is properly safeguarded, that must happen. The Government of the United States will not allow a postmaster in one of these towns or villages to keep his own account with the bank. The Government is going to supervise that account, and it will, therefore, require that account to be reported and duplicated here, as both Senators well suggest.

In addition to that, then, they must have a vast army of special agents, who from time to time will go down to the post-office and compare the postmaster's book with those of the local bank to see if they tally.

Mr. President, in addition to these, you must have the bonds which are to be executed, and into the solvency of each bondsmen there must be an inquiry made, or if in lieu of a bond they deposit securities, then the Government must ascertain and satisfy itself of the value of those securities.

Oh, no, Mr. President; we are organizing a vast banking system in this country, and we must be prepared to incur and defray the expenses of it. Now, mark you, that this is on the supposition that we are going to call all of this money from its hiding places, from the strong boxes and the stockings, and the various other devices for concealing it and keeping it; and if they succeed in doing that, 50,000 men will be fewer than will be required to execute this law, and those 50,000 men will receive a salary of more than $50,000,000. Are the people of the United States to be taxed to pay this vast sum of $50,000,000 and the banks to have this money without being required to meet the expenses of obtaining it?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I certainly do admire the heroic fighting qualities of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. He retreats from one line to another with great dexterity, and always turns about and presents a good, lusty front. First, it was the Constitution with which we could not successfully contend as to this question.

Mr. BAILEY. Having tried that on the Senator from Montana unsuccessfully, I thought I would try the financial argument. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, failing on the logic, the Senator from Texas begins with what we out West call a "ghosting expedition." He conjures up 50,000 alleged employees to receive over $50,000,000 per annum in salary; he loads this vast expense upon this system, and would have us believe that ere this session adjourns we shall be called upon to make a $45,000,000 additional appropriation.

Mr. President, what are the facts? The Postmaster-General announces, and has repeatedly announced to the committee, that the staff in the present presidential post-offices is ample to take care of the money-order business and any other business that may occur in connection with this postal savings depository. It must be borne in mind, as I have taken occasion to say——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. I shall certainly be glad to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. It is rather a statement than a question; and it is that if, with a deficit of $17,000,000 staring him in the face, the Postmaster-General has permitted the post-offices to employ more men than are necessary for the present work, his recommendation is not of much value.

Mr. CARTER. Clearly we must employ in all the first-class, second-class, and third-class money-order offices—what are commonly called the "presidential offices"—a money-order clerk. That clerk, it is true, does some other things in connection with his duty by assignment. These money-order clerks are now transacting a business of over $490,000,000 each year. This may add from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 more to the volume of the business. The postal authorities, through the various clerical forces now available, transact a cash business exceeding $700,000,000 to-day. It is true that some deficiency arises from the general operations of the service. Various causes are attributed as sufficient or approximate. But, Mr. President, there is no serious charge that any part of the clerical force of the Post-Office Department can be dispensed with, yet additional labor may be placed upon it without overburdening the force at hand, according to the statement of the Postmaster-General.

With reference to fourth-class post-offices, constituting the great mass of this force issuing money orders, there being over 40,000 of them, we provide in this bill for allowing a commission precisely as we allow a commission for the transaction of other business in that class of offices. This commission can not exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent, and probably on an average will not exceed one-eighth of 1 per cent for such business as may be there transacted. The employment of the force at Washington certainly can not exceed in number the force employed to take care of the money-order business, which is now being taken care of in an orderly manner in the department with about 60 clerks, all told. That business, Mr. President, will each year be five times as large in point of volume and fully as intricate in detail as any part or portion of this work.

The postal system of every country where the postal savings institution has been established has moved along without hindrance or destruction, and surely our system is quite as efficient as the system of Great Britain, or of Russia, or of Austria, or of Italy, or of Belgium, or of Japan, or of the Philippine Islands. It will not do to marshal up this imaginary army, and because of the prospect of such an enormous increase in the staff defeat a measure which ought to be disposed of on the merits. I doubt if it will be necessary at any time to charge in excess of 2¼ per cent in order to make up the expenses. If so, it will not be a charge against the postal revenues, because the board under this bill will be authorized to increase the rate of interest so as to provide for the payment of the interest we are obligated to pay to the depositors, for the expenses of administration, for all proper charges, and to meet losses, so that the system will unquestionably be here, as it has been everywhere else, a self-sustaining system.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes in relation to some of the general features of the postal savings-bank proposition. I regret that, owing to my necessary absence from the Senate, I have been driven to postpone these observations to an hour which possibly might be better occupied; but I feel that it is due to those whom I represent here to say some things which they have called to my attention, and with which I am in hearty accord, in respect to some of the pending proposals in connection with this measure.

It is an interesting study, mainly in psychology, that everybody seems to think that the postal savings-bank proposition in the United States is a novel and interesting departure in our jurisprudence. The fact is, this proposition has been pending in Congress in a definite and concrete form for now nearly half a century. It was originally recommended to Congress in the administration of General Grant by Postmaster-General Creswell, and his recommendation was followed by bills which were introduced in both Houses of Congress and reintroduced session after session practically in every Congress from that time to these very recent years.

What was the reason that a proposition thus supported by high executive authority for so many years has failed even of a scant consideration in Congress? It requires no very close study of the debates to see exactly why the proposition went to pieces. The people of the various States objected to having their money, collected in 10-cent pieces and in multiples thereof, taken out of the territory where it was earned, and where it ought to be used in the business and investments of the community, and brought to the political center of the United States to be used for any purpose.

Now, curiously enough, the Republican platform, without any dissent that I have ever heard of, adopted the postal savings-bank idea, but it did not do so without finding in the public mind exactly the sort of a postal savings bank that was intended. I had the honor of serving upon the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the previous Congress.

Long before the meeting of the Republican national convention I joined with my honored and distinguished friend from Montana [Mr. CARTER] in reporting, I think without any dissent in either party, from the Post-Office Committee of the Senate the postal savings-depository bill of the last Congress. It was a bill which proposed to establish a universal system of postal savings, requiring the money to be deposited in national banks in the neighborhood where it was accumulated and used in the business of the community where it belonged. That is not any departure from sound doctrine. It was in direct line with the recommendations of John Wanamaker, the most practical and in some respects the greatest business man of America who has ever participated in our Government.

In his annual report to Congress in the year 1890 he pointed out distinctly that it was impossible to find investment for these funds in the bonds of the United States, because the bonds were then being rapidly paid off. He pointed out also that it was an injustice to every neighborhood in the United States to take the modest earnings of the poor and transport them for any kind of use anywhere else, and proposed, as a practical solution of the difficulty, that the funds should be deposited in the neighborhood banks.

That exact recommendation was made to the committee in the last Congress by the then Postmaster-General, who is now the Secretary of the Navy of the United States. He was also a man of farsighted business experience and capacity. He understood the folly and ruin incident to a policy which takes away from remote communities, where capital is most needed, the earnings of the people and brings them to a political center for the purpose of being used to float the fiscal operations of the Government. Testifying before our committee, in words of singular force and influence he proposed the exact scheme of bill which is now pending before this body. So that it is a very farfetched contention that those of us who are anxious to have this money used in the neighborhood where it is most needed and where it has been earned are enemies of any feasible postal savings-bank system.

For my own part, I have had a good deal of difficulty to bring myself to much enthusiasm upon the postal savings-bank proposition as a practical matter. That arises mainly from the fact that the community in which I live is probably better supplied with commercial banking institutions than any similar population anywhere else in the United States. I do not think there is that pressure of public opinion which would warrant a man going very far beyond the boundaries of his own discretion and prudence in such a matter, and yet I have felt as a partisan that it is the duty of those responsible for the Government of the United States now to perfect some working system of postal savings.

I feel that all the more keenly, because it was a part of my business in the late campaign, wherever I had an opportunity to speak to the people where the question of the safety of bank deposits was up for debate, to explain to them that it was the policy of the Republican party to establish this distinct system in order that those who were afraid of the banks in times of trouble and peril and panic might confide their funds to the Government of the United States, which would itself become a depository, and in that sense a guarantor of the integrity of such deposits. So I and many others who participated in that great campaign are not in a position to turn aside from the policy involved in the bill that was then pending in the Senate and was then in the public mind, which had been recommended by the Postmaster-General and approved by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this body, and turn about the scheme of postal savings depositories so as to make it a mere accessory of the Treasury of the United States.

I am not one of those who look with very much expectation of good upon thrift cultivated in the individual at the expense of the commercial life of the neighborhood in which he lives. Thrift, while it may be a personal virtue, has never, in the absence of effective commercial machinery, been of very much benefit to any community. The most saving and frugal people in the world are the Chinese, unless, possibly, the people of India, in hoarding their little funds; and yet the very process of hoarding these funds has become a burden and a curse to their commercial life, for the simple reason that society in those nations has furnished no facility to take those earnings and distribute them in the channels of trade and enterprise and investment. So it has literally come about that the most frugal nations of the world have been damaged and bankrupted by the very thrift and economy which their people have practiced. It is those nations which have used this thrift of the people to serve the commercial community, the industrial organization, that have turned natural thrift into an asset and made it a part of the national wealth.

It is not true that the nations of the Old World which have established a postal savings-bank system, have escaped the injuries incident to withdrawing local funds from local enterprises and putting them in the great centers of commerce, industry, and politics. I suppose the best-managed postal savings system of the world is the English. After a debate lasting nearly a century, Mr. Gladstone, in 1861, succeeded in establishing a system of postal savings banks and trustee savings banks in Great Britain, and years afterwards, as Mr. Morley records, he looked back to that act of one of his earliest administrations as the most signal service he had been able to render the English people; but it is not true that the system of the English savings banks, conducted mainly through the post-offices, has been an unmitigated blessing to Great Britain.

I have before me an article printed only a short time ago by the London Statist, which in some respects is the highest authority in economics in the English-speaking world. It speaks especially, commenting upon a letter from an Irish manufacturer, of the burden and curse the postal savings-bank system has laid upon Ireland, a poor country, needing all the capital it could get, maintaining an uncertain commercial and industrial activity, and looking forward to a development that has been very slow in coming. This Irish manufacturer points out the fact that the postal savings system of England has steadily drained out of Ireland the modest earnings of the poor now for more than a generation, and piled them up in the treasury or in the banks of London, to be used in the fiscal operations of the British Government. Instead of being a service to that community, this practical student says that it has been a burden, and the editor of the Statist, on December 22, 1906, commenting upon that fact, has some very interesting things to say. He says:

THRIFT AND ENTERPRISE.

"An Irish Manufacturer," in a letter upon which we commented in our issue of November 17, cited the growth of Irish deposits in the savings banks as evidence of the increasing prosperity of Ireland. He is not singular in this, it being a common thing for writers and speakers of a certain school to point to the Irish savings-bank deposits as evidence that prosperity in that country is augmenting. This shows a very general misapprehension of the function of thrift which it may be worth while to remove. Saving, as the very word implies, does not mean that anything new is produced. What it does convey is that something already existing is preserved for future use. Saving, then, does not add to the existing stock of wealth. It is good for the individuals who save, inasmuch as they lay by either for their own future or for their family's things which may afterwards be consumed. But it does not change the aggregate wealth. Of the various commodities composing material wealth, some are so quickly perishable that they do not permit of being saved. It is only those which perish slowly that can be saved for any length of time. While money, whether coin or notes—and what we are about to say applies also to precious stones—if hoarded, rather reduces than increases the wealth of the community, the coin or notes being withdrawn from immediate circulation. Moreover, the place where they are hidden may possibly be forgotten, and they may be lost altogether. Even if they are ultimately brought out, they only enable either the holder or his representatives to purchase what they want. They do not add to the wealth already in existence. It is not until savings are employed as capital—until, in fact, they are made the agents of enterprise—that they help production.

Thrift resembles a great waterfall. Niagara has been in existence since North America assumed its present form, yet it did not add to the convenience of man until it was used the other day in producing electricity. Thrift may for an immense length of time be equally balanced; in fact, it was barren in Europe almost from the fall of the Roman Empire until the foundation of modern banking, and to a great extent it is barren to-day over the greater part of Asia. It need hardly be pointed out that the source of all progress is invention and research, using the latter word in its broadest acceptation to cover the speculations, experiments, in short, the labor, of inventors, as well as the inquiries of all who are searching after knowledge of every kind. But even invention, however valuable, would be barren if nobody could be found willing to risk the capital in applying it. Therefore, enterprise is the immediate agent in production, whether we think of savings or of invention. The so-called "orthodox political economists" paid no attention to enterprise, while they dubbed abstinence or thrift one of the three agents of production with land and labor. It is characteristic of that looseness of thinking of theirs, which has so discredited political economy in the minds of the present generation.

The middle classes, though little given to philosophy, early recognized that thrift is barren until fructified by enterprise. They were quick, therefore, to recognize the value of banks and to turn them to their advantage. It was not, however, until joint-stock banking grew up that the full value of banking in general was demonstrated. Then the hoards which had been hidden away in old stockings, bedding, and what not were brought forth and were used for that extraordinary development of the material resources of the world which has characterized the past seventy or eighty years. Whether it be that the task is less easy than it seems or that the working classes are less fitted by their previous history than the middle classes to avail themselves of machinery calculated to serve their class interests, or whether it be that the more ingenious, enterprising, and successful of the working classes quickly rise into the middle class and then cease to interest themselves in the class they have left, at all events it is certain that the working classes have never been able up to the present to devise a banking system suited to their means.

The cooperative banks of the Continent do, no doubt, minister to a small portion of the working classes. But they are not specially working-class banks. They are banks for all classes who care to avail themselves of them, and they are availed of more by the very small trader and the very small farmer than by the working classes. A working-class bank, properly so called, has yet to be founded. Meanwhile the British Government, in its very laudable desire to promote thrift amongst the poor, called into existence the savings banks. But it proceeded almost immediately to neutralize the effect of what it had done; for, on the pretense that the Government could not guarantee the integrity of the deposits unless those deposits were invested in its own securities, it decided to employ the savings-banks deposits for the purpose of bolstering up the credit of the nation; instead, that is to say, of using the deposits of the very poor for the purpose of assisting the enterprise of the very poor—in other words, in the spirit in which the banks of the middle classes had been used—the Government proceeded to employ those deposits for the benefit of the whole community. The thrifty amongst the poor had no option but to submit. As we said in the article referred to above, saving has gone on at all times and in all countries of the world. It went on in mediæval Europe when the barons systematically robbed all who were not strong enough to defend what they possessed. And it went on in Asia, where no man's life or property was safe for a moment. A certain type of man, then, will save even though the probability may be that he will never benefit by his thrift, and as the thrifty knew no way of employing their savings more safely and more profitably than by putting them in the savings banks, they did so. But it is demonstrable in the cleverest manner that the poor, as a class, have not benefited, however the individual thrifty depositors may have done, by this procedure, and it is doubtful whether the whole community has benefited in the long run.

The immense mass of deposits which the Government had at its disposal enabled it to raise the price of consols to such a point that it was in a position to convert the national debt, and it is a debatable question whether the community has benefited or the reverse in consequence of that conversion. It must never be forgotten that the British Government is administered by amateurs—that is, by men who have never had any proper training for the work they undertake, men who often, indeed, are pitchforked into great offices with whose procedure they have not the slightest acquaintance. If it were otherwise, it is possible, of course, that the whole financial administration of the country would have been conducted very differently—that we should not have seen, eight or ten years ago, consols at 113, and the other day at 85. It is also possible that the savings banks would have been differently constituted, and that they would have materially helped to raise the well-being of the poor. But as matters stand, it is extremely doubtful whether the command of such immense sums has benefited the community, and it is demonstrable that the savings banks have not benefited the poor as a class.

Ireland is a very poor country. Her resources are quite undeveloped. Practically, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that she has not yet entered upon an economic life. Until little more than two hundred years ago she was engaged for five centuries in a life-and-death struggle with this country, which ended in a conquest which, to all intents and purposes, made the natives mere helots in their own land, they being disqualified for holding any office of trust or profit, disqualified even for buying the fee simple of land. Since then they have been engaged in a struggle to win back some portion of what they lost during the wars of the conquest.

The result is that economically the country is almost untouched. Naturally, therefore, she requires abundant capital and abundant labor. Of the abundant labor she once possessed she has been deprived, as we have explained in previous articles, by famine, pestilence, eviction, and emigration. And yet, though her population now is barely one-half of what it was sixty-five years ago, the rate of agricultural wages—agriculture being practically the business of five-sixths of the people—is little more than half what it is in Great Britain. Could there be a stronger proof of poverty and decay? Being a poor country, she has not sufficient capital of her own. But the London press dwells so exclusively upon agitation and outrage in its reports about Ireland that it spreads the conviction in Great Britain that Ireland is a country in which neither life nor property is secure. Therefore, the British investor turns away from all invitations to invest in Ireland or, at all events, from all except those of the very highest and securest kind. Thus those who have any little enterprise in Ireland are driven back upon Irish capital; and here again they discover the British Government to be a serious difficulty, for they find themselves face to face with the competition of that Government. In June of the present year the Irish deposits in the savings banks were, in round figures, £13,000,000, and this (for Ireland) very large sum is employed not in developing any Irish industry, but in bolstering up the credit of the United Kingdom. We would ask the reader to look at the quotation for consols, and to consider with himself whether the United Kingdom is really benefited by the system which has brought consols to their present quotation. Nobody will dispute that the Irishman of enterprise is seriously handicapped by the fact that so much Irish money is drawn away from Irish to imperial purposes. Just as Ireland has been laying out large sums annually for sixty-five years in rearing young men and women to export them, without getting any return, to the United States and the colonies, to create there vast wealth, so in finance Ireland is pinching and saving about thirteen millions of money to export it to London for the purpose of bolstering up an amateurish system of finance, which has brought the national credit to the pitch at which we see it.

I desire also, with the consent of the Senate, to read an extract from an article similar in character, and testimony from the London Banker's Magazine of a few years ago:

The branches of the post-office savings bank convey all the savings of the district which they receive straight up to the central office in London. This money is employed there in purchases of the public funds of the country; it is thus removed from the district in which it originates, and incidentally assists in raising the price of the funds to so high a point that the postmaster-general is unable to invest the amount collected on such terms as to obtain back interest which he covenants to allow his depositors, and to obtain also a sufficient margin to meet the working expenses. The deposits of the post-office savings banks thus eventually cause an expense to the country. There was a deficiency in the savings-bank funds last year which had to be made up out of the public taxation. The deposits in a commercial bank in a small town or village are, on the other hand, a source of gain to the country; they are of great service in developing the trade of the place in which the banks exist, and in assisting the inhabitants in their business. * * * Minor, but not unimportant, advantages follow; the use of specie and of notes is economized, while the trade of the country is increasingly carried on by use of checks. None of these advantages take place in the case of the opening of a new branch of the post-office savings bank. They are mentioned here, as they sometimes escape the attention of our public men, even those acquainted with other descriptions of business. They think merely of the savings banks as showing the power of the country to put by and save, and they do not think of the other side of the picture.

What are we confronted with here? I believe it would be perfectly possible to pass this bill substantially in the form in which the committee reported it. It was the purpose of the committee that these postal savings should be collected in every neighborhood in the United States, and that having been collected, the Government of the United States would put them at the service of the neighborhood where they belong. That was supposed to be the purpose of the party; that was supposed to be a rational and practicable method of procedure; but within the last few weeks we are disconcerted by the suggestion that such a procedure is unconstitutional, and besides that, we have just been treated to a very elaborate statement that it is impracticable on account of the vast expenditure of public funds to pay its expenses. It is enough to say that the Post-Office Department has fully considered that aspect of the case and dismisses all such exaggerated estimates of the expense of the system as have been presented in debate here.

I do not believe that it is unconstitutional. I know of no better judge of the Constitution of the United States in this Chamber than my honored friend, the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who has charge of this bill. I do not pretend to say that he belongs to the group who by a mutual certification of learning have acquired each on his own account a certain standing here as authorized expounders of the National Constitution, but I do mean that in practical knowledge and good sense applicable to the Constitution of the United States it would be difficult to find a man whose judgment would be better worth paying for than that of my honored friend from Montana. I do not pretend to know as much about the Constitution as a man might. All I have been able to do with it is to read it with patient attention and to make such effort as is within the reach of an ordinary mind to grasp the meaning of its language, looking to the courts to make its obscure phrases clear.

I have never gone very far astray on that, because I find that nearly everything the Government has done or is doing has been confronted by the challenge that it is in violation of the Constitution. I do not believe it. I have adopted for my own guidance a very comfortable theory of the Constitution; in fact, I borrowed it from the Chief Justice of the United States in the McCulloch v. Maryland case, in which he suggested with very great force that whatever else our Constitution may be, it is not a dead and dried-up scheme without application to the increasing needs of society and to the growth and the enlargement of the institutions of the country.

I do not intend to spend a minute trying to answer the arguments drawn by learned lawyers from the instrument itself. I find a warrant for the postal savings bank in the letter and in the spirit of the Constitution, in that paragraph which says that the Congress of the United States shall have power to establish post-offices. The post-office of 1789 was a very crude and almost a comical institution.

I was reading the other day a great but forgotten speech of Charles Sumner on the penny postage, delivered in the latter years of his career, a speech that would repay the perusal of anybody who has a taste for archæology of any sort. He gives the history of the English post-office from early days. He shows how it originated as a private institution; how it was run as a business institution; how it became profitable by overcharges; and how kindly sovereigns would pension upon its funds favorites, both male and female, and how through all those ages it had grown and developed to the post-office system which Rowland Hill perfected within the memory of living men.

The post-office of 1789 in the United States was a little institution for delivering letters, mainly on horseback or by wagons, throughout our domain. Does anybody suppose that when Congress was given the power to establish a post-office it meant to define a post-office as it was understood in those days? Our fathers were wiser men than that. They looked forward to the development of this continent. They had an eye also to the larger commercial life that was in store for this people and to the spread of its industries from one ocean to the other; and so they simply said, "Congress shall have power to establish post-offices and post-roads;" and I hold that it is a wicked perversion of legal talent for any man to say that the post-office of the United States is to be bound down by any definition that might have been given in 1789; in fact, it has not been bound down in any such way. It has grown from that feeble beginning until it is now engaged in a good many varieties of business that were absolutely unknown in those days.

I was impressed by the statement of the Senator from Montana that the money-order department of the post-office of to-day handles an annual aggregate fund of $500,000,000.

Mr. CARTER. Four hundred and ninety million dollars.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Five hundred million dollars in round figures. It is a function that was unknown in those days. What power is there in the Constitution for it? Here is a letter-carrying institution, inviting everybody in the United States and in the world to bring his money to any postal money-order office and get a certificate of deposit, which is negotiable anywhere in the market place, payable anywhere in the United States, payable to the man himself within a year at the very place at which it was issued; and yet men who do not dare to dispute the constitutionality of that stand here and tell us that the power to establish post-offices can not be extended to make a post-office the like of which exists in every nation of the civilized world to-day and is being looked forward to with hope by nations that are not yet entirely civilized.

So, I do not intend to go an inch beyond the proposition made so forcibly here yesterday by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that the power to establish a post-office carries with it the power to modernize any post-office system that was in existence at the time the Constitution was written; and yet we are instructed here by the very highest authority to take this postal savings-bank system, which originated in a desire to help the poor and the ignorant and the uninstructed to save their money, and to put that money at the service of the neighborhood where it belongs of right—we are instructed here by the highest authority that such a proposition is contrary to the Constitution of the United States; and we have been treated to a proposal to take this money, the money of the very poor, those who are so ignorant that they do not understand our banking system or even our language, those who know little of our commerce or the mechanism of our trade and our business—we are to go to them and to rake the lowly places of poverty and ignorance with a fine-tooth comb for 10-cent pieces and bring them here in order to relieve the sufferings of the banks of the United States which have been disappointed in a bond investment now more than ten years old.

We are told there is an obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to make good all the hoped-for profits of these banks; and if there is an obligation of that sort, certainly a failure to do so would be a breach of the public credit. A failure to do so would create an exigency in our national financial system which would certainly warrant the President of the United States and his trustees in taking this money and helping these good people out; and for the purpose, I reckon, of exciting sympathy for these poor bank presidents and directors scattered throughout the length and breadth of the United States we are treated to the statement that they have been a long suffering people; that these bankers have lost a good deal of money by this operation; and at Milwaukee not very long ago the President of the United States, speaking on postal savings banks, referring to the unhappy situation of these bankers, left with seven hundred millions of 2 per cent bonds on their hands, said:

> You know we have issued upward of $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds of the United States, and we have prided ourselves and our heads have been a little bit swelled on the theory that we could float bonds at 2 per cent and no other country could. We did float these at par at 2 per cent—I do not know but that it was a little more—but we did it by getting the banks into a corner so that they had to have under the law some government security, and so they were obliged to buy those 2 per cent bonds. Now they are liable to be on the market. We have to take care of them in some way. We have got to prevent their going down below par, because the normal interest rate that a government can get is quite above 2 per cent—somewhere between 2 and 3 per cent—and if we have the postal savings banks, if we have a large fund of $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 or $700,000,000, as we may expect to have in view of what has happened in Great Britain, we can use that fund to put in government bonds and take care of that issue which is our child and which, after all, we ought not to be so proud of, because we fooled the world into thinking that we were getting something at 2 per cent and that our credit was worth that, when, as a matter of fact, we were forcing the banking fraternity into taking them because of certain other advantages which they had to have. It was just a little bunco game which the Government played, and it is necessary that in any legislation which comes along we should take care of that issue of 2 per cent and not take on too heavy issue of bonds. This question is one that will doubtless involve a great deal of discussion.

Well, I should think it would. It is going to involve not only a good deal of discussion in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives, but it is going to excite a very large interest among that portion of our people who have left a sufficient independence of mind and thought to care for what is going on in the Congress of the United States.

When I heard that an exigency had arisen which required the Government to take over these 2 per cent bonds, the first thing that occurred to me was, where these 2 per cent bonds would be found to invest this money in. I turned to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and I find that all these bonds, or nearly all, are now in the Treasury of the United States as trust funds, held there for the banks who have deposited them as security for their circulation and as collateral for the deposits which the Secretary has been kind enough to make in many of these banks. They are not for sale. They are not due till 1930, and curiously enough the act of Congress creating them does not make them payable till 1930. That struck me as peculiar.

If these bonds can not be paid until 1930, where is the occasion to borrow money now or within the next few years while we are in the Congress of the United States, to create a fund to take them up. Do these banks want to sell them? Was there any obligation on the part of the Government when the banks took them to save them from loss? Was any underhand means adopted by the Government of the United States to force these 2 per cents on the national banks? Was there any bunco game played? My friends, we are come upon a time of amateurs in our national affairs.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me for just a moment I should like to call his attention to the fact that the national currency being based upon 2 per cent bonds, if we should have a great war and those bonds should drop to 66, the national currency would be greatly impaired, gold would go into hiding, and this country would receive a serious financial shock. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa deal with that subject as only the Senator from Iowa can.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would not object to having the Government lay its hands on any available fund to prevent the collapse of the public credit of the United States, and I shall offer no objection to an amendment to what is known as the "Smoot amendment," putting these funds, in case the public credit is threatened by war, into the hands of the President or these trustees, to be used for the purpose of fortifying the credit of the United States. The thing I object to is using them for the purpose of fortifying the pockets of people who, very far from being bunkoed in their original acquisition, have profited, if I have correctly figured the situation, at least reasonably by the refunding of the public debt in 1900.

I have before me the act of 1900 refunding the national debt. I remember it very well, because in the House of Representatives we were not, in those days at least, overaware of the mental processes that go on here, and I reckon it might as well be admitted that we were not as smart as those who manage our affairs here.

The sections I refer to are as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any of the outstanding bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, payable February 1, 1904, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum, payable July 1, 1907, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum, payable August 1, 1908, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and said bonds to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That such outstanding bonds may be received in exchange at a valuation not greater than their present worth to yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum; and in consideration of the reduction of interest effected, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to the holders of the outstanding bonds surrendered for exchange, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum not greater than the difference between their present worth, computed as aforesaid, and their par value, and the payments to be made hereunder shall be held to be payments on account of the sinking fund created by section 3694 of the Revised Statutes: And provided further, That the 2 per cent bonds to be issued under the provisions of this act shall be issued at not less than par, and they shall be numbered consecutively in the order of their issue, and when payment is made the last numbers issued shall be first paid, and this order shall be followed until all the bonds are paid, and whenever any of the outstanding bonds are called for payment interest thereon shall cease three months after such call; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to effect the exchanges of bonds provided for in this act, a sum not exceeding one-fifteenth of 1 per cent of the face value of said bonds, to pay the expense of preparing and issuing the same and other expenses incident thereto.

SEC. 12. That upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, by any national banking association, of any bonds of the United States in the manner provided by existing law, such association shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to the par value of the bonds so deposited; and any national banking association now having bonds on deposit for the security of circulating notes, and upon which an amount of circulating notes has been issued less than the par value of the bonds, shall be entitled, upon due application to the Comptroller of the Currency, to receive additional circulating notes in blank to an amount which will increase the circulating notes held by such association to the par value of the bonds deposited, such additional notes to be held and treated in the same way as circulating notes of national banking associations heretofore issued, and subject to all the provisions of law affecting such notes: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to modify or repeal the provisions of section 5167 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to require additional deposits of bonds or of lawful money in case the market value of the bonds held to secure the circulating notes shall fall below the par value of the circulating notes outstanding for which such bonds may be deposited as security: And provided further, That the circulating notes furnished to national banking associations under the provisions of this act shall be of the denominations prescribed by law, except that no national banking association shall, after the passage of this act, be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency, or to issue or reissue or place in circulation, more than one-third in amount of its circulating notes of the denomination of $5: And provided further, That the total amount of such notes issued to any such association may equal at any time but shall not exceed the amount at such time of its capital stock actually paid in: And provided further, That under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury any national banking association may substitute the 2 per cent bonds issued under the provisions of this act for any of the bonds deposited with the Treasurer to secure circulation or to secure deposits of public money; and so much of an act entitled "An act to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1882, as prohibits any national bank which makes any deposit of lawful money in order to withdraw its circulating notes from receiving any increase of its circulation for the period of six months from the time it made such deposit of lawful money for the purpose aforesaid, is hereby repealed, and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed.

SEC. 13. That every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, issued under the provisions of this act, to secure its circulating notes, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of said 2 per cent bonds; and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its notes in circulation imposed by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I do not wish to interrupt the argument of the Senator at all, but I can not help recalling the fact that the national banks of the United States are practically receiving a bonus of $12,000,000 per annum on these very bonds.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I read this statute for the purpose of confirming a view corresponding to the Senator's opinion, a view which I had formed by a very cursory reference to it.

We have been told—and the document has been printed as a Senate document, I believe; certainly as a House document—that the banks of the United States were bunceed by the Congress of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury to take these 2 per cent bonds. Fortunately, the act of 1900 is within the memory of living men. Otherwise probably a proposition like that might have gone unchallenged, as it has throughout the public press of the United States, so far as I have observed.

The act of 1900 fixing the gold standard went through the House of Representatives in a very modest form. In those days, without much experience in this cold world, we thought when you wanted to fix the gold standard you could do it in about five or six lines; that all you had to do was to say "Hereafter the standard of value in the United States shall be the gold dollar of a certain weight and fineness." And that is what we did. But we were amateurs, too. When our bill came to the Senate, it became a mere nucleus around which was assembled all the fruitage of the financial wisdom which had ripened in this body up to that time.

So that after the standard of value was nicely fixed the question arose what to do with these bonds of the United States. Here were bonds bearing 5 per cent, bonds bearing 4½ per cent, bonds bearing 4 per cent; some of them had originated as far back as the war; others had originated during an unhappy period in which the Republican administration of government was interrupted for a brief time. They all bore a high rate of interest, and here was the Secretary of the Treasury, with money coming in a good deal faster even than it is now, even comparing the monthly averages, and the problem was what to do with our money—a problem which does not confront us at present. They were buying these bonds at considerable rates of premium and retiring them, not millions, but hundreds of millions of them; and it suddenly dawned upon everybody about the same time that if we paid off the public debt our national-bank system, so far as its circulating feature was concerned, would be without an adequate foundation.

So the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage—and I speak of him with great respect and reverence, because in some respects he was the wisest man that we have had in that office, within my time at least; a practical banker, a man of good sense in all business questions—suggested that the entire public debt of the United States, amounting to about $900,000,000, could just as well as not be funded at 2 per cent. He proposed it publicly, and the Congress of the United States attached his recommendations in substance to this act fixing the gold standard; and the proposition was that people who held these bonds should present them at the Treasury and that a bonus defined in this law—and I have inserted the exact language of the statute—should be given to cover the difference between the present worth of the bonds surrendered and the par value of the bonds taken in exchange for them, so that everybody who surrendered a 4½ per cent bond of the Government of the United States got paid in cash the difference between the value of that bond as an investment proposition and the value of the bond which he obtained. Am I not correct about that?

More than that, to make the proposition peculiarly palatable to national banks this act to fix the gold standard raised the limit on the circulation privilege. Prior to that circulation could be issued only up to 90 per cent of the par value of a bond. After that act the circulation was issued up to the full par value of a bond.

But they did even more for these long-suffering brethren. They reduced the duty, as this statute describes it—I have heard so many debates that I do not know whether it was a duty or an excise or an internal-revenue tax, or what it was, but this statute calls it a duty—which had previously been 1 per cent upon the circulation of money by the national banks, to a quarter of 1 per cent.

After they had got that all done, the banks, of their own free will and without any compulsion and without any misrepresentation, came in and took the 2 per cent bonds, running for thirty years, in exchange for these old bonds that were about to mature and which had a very dubious value as a speculative proposition owing to that fact; and the banks now own $700,000,000 of these 2 per cent bonds, acquired on profitable terms under this act of their own free will without any bunko or sleight of hand performance of any kind.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. OWEN. May I give a concrete case showing how profitable it was and precisely how it was done?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Which side of this question are you on?

Mr. OWEN. I am on the side of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I very gladly yield to the Senator from Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I was connected with one of these banks, and am still, and I have a great interest in it. We telegraphed our correspondent, just after that act was passed, purchasing $250,000 of these bonds. The currency against these bonds, issued as the currency of this particular bank, was used to pay for the purchase of the bonds, less a small item of premium; and thereafter and since that time this bank has been receiving 2 per cent on the bonds substantially without any investment whatever. The bonds yield about one and a half per cent net, and as the national banks are getting the interest on over seven hundred millions of bonds which cost the banks nothing (or a negligible amount), they have abused the confidence of their friends in claiming to be bunkoed. They can stand the game if the American people can.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If that is a typical case, what will the American people say to us? Waiving aside the authority and prestige of great constitutional and economic authorities, what will the American people say to us if we deliberately here, directly or indirectly, provide to take the savings of the humble poor of the country for the purpose of relieving these good people of the losses that are alleged to have grown out of this great condescension on their part ten years ago when they helped the Government of the United States out of trouble?

I undertake to say that none of those bonds are available, and none could be available unless the circulation of the national banks of the United States is curtailed. But as Congress has been for ten years trying to stimulate that circulation until it has more than doubled it in that period, I doubt very much whether anybody expects the circulation of the banks to be curtailed.

What, then, is the purpose of connecting up this postal-savings fund with the Treasury of the United States? My friends, it is a sad confession to make, but it is very difficult to find out what is going on in this town, mainly for the reason that the key to nearly every situation is hung up on a nail somewhere else. I have taken advantage of the leisure, which is a part of the compensation that Providence gives us for infirmities of the flesh, to find out if possible what is the purpose of taking these savings-bank funds and using them at the discretion of the Treasury of the United States in the operations of the bond division.

My friends, it is one of those early birds which predict the coming of spring; it is one of those straws which indicate sometimes the direction of the wind; and it is well for those of us who have not yet made up our minds about the future of the banking system of the United States to understand exactly what is intended here. I have tried in vain to find it out here, although I have diligently talked with every good and sufficient man whom I could engage in conversation.

But I received not long ago a circular letter, and I read it because it was not marked "personal" or "confidential." I am interested in it because it states in advance what we are doing here and because you will get the information a long time before it will come to you in the ordinary course of your mail. It shows that we are not engaged here in encouraging thrift among the poor; we are not engaged here in putting idle money at the service of the business community, which we ought to help instead of hinder; we are engaged here in paving the way for the abolition of the national banking system as a means of circulating paper money in the United States.

I have here a statement, kindly issued by the National City Bank of New York, where information of all sorts is obtainable, according to an advertisement on the back of it. It seems to have facilities for knowing what is doing, because it invites the whole banking community, if they want to know anything about what is going on in Washington, to communicate with them, and it states with absolute clearness exactly what part we are playing in our poor, ignorant, uninstructed way toward those financial reforms that are to be the glory of the future.

While the near future as to government bonds is somewhat clearer than it was a month or two ago—general conditions which affect the longer outlook are becoming more and more complicated.

That means that it can hardly tell what we are going to do. That is simply the scientific statement of the uncertainty which has prevailed in this country as to how people might look at these things. They concede to at least some of us a general desire to reflect even in a mild way the prejudices which sometimes are mistaken for the opinions and convictions of the people among whom we live. So in the uncertainty of the future they say that the larger outlook is being more and more complicated.

It is known—

Now, it may be that you know this, but, upon my word, it is the first I had heard of it—

It is known that the Monetary Commission will in the course of a year or two, and perhaps earlier, be prepared to report some plan of currency reform which may involve the note-issuing powers of the national banks. These banks own more than $700,000,000 of the $913,000,000 interest-bearing debt. They hold the bonds under special inducement as to circulation privileges—

There are no special inducements. The bonds were exchanged for these 2 per cent by the seduction of the circulation privileges. They lasted longer and were less liable to create inconvenience, and that was the special privilege that pertained to them.

They hold the bonds under special inducements as to circulation privileges, and have suffered a loss of $30,000,000 in their premium accounts by reason of the depreciation in governments during the last two years.

What does the Senator from Oklahoma say to that? Is that a question of bookkeeping or money?

Mr. OWEN. I did not hear the question.

Mr. DOLLIVER. This circular, in a tone of pathos that has affected me—I do not know how it affects others—says that these banks, which hold $700,000,000 of these 2 per cents, have suffered a loss of $30,000,000 in their premium accounts by reason of the depreciation in governments during the last two years. I wanted to know whether that was on the books or on the counter.

Mr. OWEN. That depends upon whether you take the high prices of those bonds or the one at which they were originally acquired.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Then it is a somewhat complicated question.

Mr. OWEN. Not at all. It is merely a matter of bookkeeping. My bank charged off the premium to start on and suffers no bookkeeping loss or any other loss.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yet these bonds are likely to be at par when they are paid, are they not? They would not want to throw off any?

Mr. OWEN. These bonds are practically earning 2 per cent, less the charge against the currency annually, without any investment at all.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That seems like a cold-blooded statement.

Mr. OWEN. It is a cold-blooded statement. It is the truth. The bonds are bought with the notes of the bank, and the bank is allowed to issue the notes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Do the banks get the notes before they put up the bonds?

Mr. OWEN. No; they order the bonds through their correspondent and have the notes delivered to their correspondents in payment of the bonds.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is a mere exchange of their notes for these bonds?

Mr. OWEN. It is an exchange; that is all. It is a very convenient and comfortable transaction, and is all right from the standpoint of the banker.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is calculated to bring tears to anybody's eyes after he thoroughly understands it.

Mr. OWEN. The substantial fact is that from twelve to fourteen millions per annum are paid to the banks without consideration, as interest on these bonds bought by the banks with their own notes. For example, a bank buys a hundred thousand dollars of bonds through its New York correspondent, instructing the bonds to be deposited in the United States Treasury and the national-bank notes of such bank to be drawn from the Treasury in payment thereof. The bonds are thus paid for and thereafter the bank gets 2 per cent per annum less the legal charges of about one-half of 1 per cent. It does not seem clear how the banks can claim to be "bunkoed" by this transaction, but the American people who pay this interest of 2 per cent on seven hundred millions, or fourteen millions annually, have a just right to protest, but they do not seem to care.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, let me go ahead:

What will be done as to this vast holding in case the power to issue circulation is given over to a central institution? This is a question which vitally concerns the Government and the banks. Its answer has been attempted in connection with the pending postal savings-bank legislation, by an amendment providing for the investment of postal savings deposits in United States bonds.

What amendment was that? I believe the honored Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] invented that idea, or at least it came here with that authority which attends an introduction from him. What has become of that amendment? I saw in the newspapers that it has been withdrawn. Withdrawn for what? For repairs? I have thought so. I prefer very much what is known as the "Root amendment" to any of this legerdemain of language with which we have been treated here in the Senate for the last few days. If you want to do a thing and are not ashamed of it, say so, and let judgment at the hands of the American people be the penalty of the errors which you make, if you make any.

The time has come in this Congress when whatever is intended has got to be definitely and openly expressed in the English language, in our laws and in our proposed legislation. I say to you that I would infinitely rather vote for the Root amendment, which says what it means, than for any indirect circumlocution, the meaning of which is known to only a few interpreters, who are harder to understand, even, than the language itself.

That is the reason why I do not like these delicate modifications of what is called the "Smoot amendment." You can not tell what is to be done under them or by them. They refer to the public credit. Everybody is his own judge of what the public credit requires. They refer to the public welfare, some of them, so I see in the newspapers. Where has that amendment gone?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Those words were withdrawn.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Withdrawn?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just those words.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not know whether this savings-bank bill will pass this Congress or not, but I give you one fair warning that when it passes, it will be in language which is understood not only here, but by the people of the United States, and there will be no covered holes through which their purpose may slip; there will be no masks and false faces upon the measure; but every line of it will be so plain that the wayfaring man, though he has been sick for a while, will not err therein.

But I want to read a line or two further, because this circular is likely to become somewhat classic:

So much opposition from the country has developed because of the insistence that postal deposits be kept in the communities where they originate that it is thought the amendment will fail.

This periodical, it appears, is a monthly, and this number is dated in March; but they probably had not heard that it had failed—that is to say, that it had failed in the form in which the people could understand it.

Although it would undoubtedly be objectionable from other points of view its passage would solve, in great part, a serious and vexing situation.

Namely, what to do with the 2 per cents left in the hands of good people after the national banking system had given way to a central bank of issue—a serious problem two years off, of course; not so far off, however, that those of us who are willing to act as pawns in a game which is not even explained to us might contribute by our votes to prepare the way for the trial of a new scheme of finance without even the poor comfort of knowing what we were doing.

I for one propose to stand by the postal savings-bank system as it was in the mind of the American people when the platform of the Republican party was adopted, with the postal deposits put in the neighboring banks for the service of the people and left there. If there shall creep into this measure any words or any line that would put it within the discretion of anybody, under any pretense of borrowing money or maintaining the public credit, except as a means of defense in time of public danger, I will find in such a provision a sufficient reason for leaving our banking and postal systems substantially as they are, so far as one vote is concerned.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I, of course, like every other Senator, have been very much interested in this question of the postal savings bank and the reason for its being adopted. The plank in the platform of the Democratic party and also in the Republican party give it an additional interest. In reading the two platforms I find a clear distinction between them, and it is expressed in the President's address which I have before me. In a speech that he made in New York, and to which I want to call attention, he said:

We favor the establishment of a postal savings-bank system for the convenience of the people and the encouragement of thrift.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who has just taken his seat, called attention to the operation of the English postal system and how it had failed to benefit Ireland, the poorest section of that Kingdom. I take it for granted that no man will dispute me when I say that I come, perhaps, from that section of country where we stand most in need of finances and where we have been accused of being lacking in thrift. Therefore the figures that I shall submit come from that section under the present banking system and give an illustration as to whether it is time for the Government to depart from the present plan that we have and take up one that is so questionable here.

I want to call attention to the growth of the banking business of the Southern States comprising the following States: Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

In 1900 the total number of national banks in this geographic division was 596; in 1909, 1,406.

The state banks in this same territory in 1900 were 917; in 1909 there were 3,312.

The stock savings banks, joint-stock companies, and operating savings banks in this territory in 1900 were 37; in 1909 they were 181.

The private banks were 91 in the first period and 119 in the second.

The loan and trust companies, which are the pulse of the progress of commerce and finance within any community, in the first year were 3, in the last 131, making a total increase in the Southern States of fiscal institutions taken care of by the people on the soil and who became the holders of the money saved and deposited by these people—the increase in the number of banks was from a total of 1,645 to 5,150, making a net increase of all banks within the Southern States within nine years of 3,505.

That, so far as the number of national banks, I think, may interest some of those who wish to know whether we need the paternal care of the Government to offer inducement to go into the byways and hedges and draw out the money among the people and pour it into these channels about which we have been enlightened so forcibly this afternoon.

I want to call attention to the individual deposits in this geographic division, the people's money.

The individual deposits in the state banks in 1900 were $150,440,319; in 1909 they were $392,646,712.60.

In the savings banks within this same territory in 1900 there were $17,369,650; in 1909 there were $81,369,104.73. The private banks had $5,306,131 in the one period, and in the other $12,892,156.

The loan and trust companies in the Southern States in 1900 had $323,081, and in 1909 they had $58,114,871.64.

These figures are taken from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. I have read this in order to show that some other motive must be behind this bill than to encourage thrift and economy amongst our people.

I read here what seems to me to be the source and authority for the present legislation. President Taft, in his Lincoln address in New York City, February 12, 1910, said:

A bill has been introduced to establish a postal savings bank. The great difficulty in the bill seems to have been to secure a proper provision for the management and investment of the money deposited. The great advantage of a postal savings bank is the encouragement to thrift of those whose fears of the solvency of any depository except a government depository tempts them away from saving.

In answer to that statement from the President, I have submitted these tables to show that in the poorest section of the Union, not because of their lack of thrift, but because of the unfortunate termination of the war, we have within nine years beginning with this period and going back quadrupled and made as high as 3,000 per cent increase in our savings and in our deposits.

Therefore this statement on the part of the President that this is for the purpose of encouraging thrift and giving the people confidence in their fiscal institutions is not maintained from the poorest section. Reference to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency of 1909 shows that almost, with the exception of one section of the country, the same rate of increase has obtained.

There is just one other point in the President's speech, Mr. President, to which I wish to call attention. He says:

In the present stage of the Senate bill there have been inserted amendments drawn apparently for the purpose of having money deposited as savings in government post-offices distributed through the locality where deposited in the banks, state and national, and so deposited as to make it impossible for the trustees of the fund appointed under the law to withdraw the money for investment in any other form.

He means in any other form save than in the form of government bonds.

I regard such an amendment as likely to defeat the law—

He says he suspects that is likely to defeat the law—

first, because it takes away a feature which ought to be present in the law to assure its constitutionality. If the law provided that the trustees to be appointed under the law with the funds thus deposited could meet the financial exigencies of the Government by purchase or redemption of the government 2 per cent bonds and other bonds, the measure would certainly be within the federal power, because the postal banks would then clearly be an instrument of the National Government in borrowing money.

This is quite interesting in that it controverts some other things which have been said here this afternoon. I read again from the same speech:

We have now about $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds with respect to which we owe a duty to the owners to see that those bonds may be taken care of without reduction below the par value thereof, because they were forced upon national banks at this low rate in order that the banks might have a basis of circulation.

I do not care if those on our side are to be twitted with the fact that this is also in our platform, and that we should not oppose this bill. I want to say that I stand here representing a State that has suffered most and striven hardest, and I do not propose to allow any form of bill, under any name, to beguile me into voting for what, in substance, is contrary to the spirit of our party. The President also says this:

This implied obligation of the Government, the postal savings-bank funds would easily enable it to meet. Secondly, if the funds are to be arbitrarily deposited in all banks, state and national, without national supervision over the state banks, and a panic were to come, it is difficult to see how the Government could meet its obligations to its postal savings-bank depositors, because with every bank suspending payment, the funds of the postal savings banks would be beyond the control of the Government, and we should have a financial disaster greater than any panic we have heretofore met.

Further he says:

A provision that when the money is not needed to invest in government bonds or to redeem the same—

I thought it was for the purpose of encouraging thrift, and we are about to convert it into a redemption fund to retire, in case of an emergency or a change of financial system, the bonds now existing, which may not be as desirable in the future as now.

The President further says:

It may be deposited in national banks, in the neighborhood of the place of deposit, will avoid the great danger of a panic and will strengthen a banking system which is an arm of the Federal Government.

I sincerely hope that before the measure is hammered into its final shape it may take on these characteristics which shall give it a constitutional validity and sound financial strength and usefulness. Those who insist upon the elimination of these two necessary characteristic features of the bill will put the party in the position where it can not hope to escape the charge that it is not in good faith seeking the passage of a postal savings-bank act, and is not seeking, therefore, to comply with the promise of the Republican platform in that regard.

Now, Mr. President, the time is late, and I ask the privilege of inserting in my remarks the tables which I have laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the permission asked for will be granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The total number of failures of national banks within the period practically that I have named and the territory named was 20. The figures I have not right at my hand, but they can be verified by reference to the comptroller's report. The number of failures of private institutions, which have increased almost 100 per cent over the national banks, has been about 3 per cent less. So that, in summing up, we find that in the banking institutions of this country the element of failure has been so far eliminated that we have increased our deposits by leaps and bounds, and that the national bank, which is called the "right arm of the Government," has not kept pace even with the private state institutions. I say that this Government should at this period not interfere unless it can offer better facilities for us to do our banking business in our own communities. I do not believe that it is good Republican doctrine, nor is it good Democratic doctrine, for us to pass a law which by the circular which was read by the Senator from Iowa, which circular I read carefully last night, looks toward shouldering upon the unsuspecting people of this country bonds which will have to be retired when the great, monstrous scheme of a central bank shall have been thrust upon us, and this postal savings-bank bill adroitly framed to lead to that event.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 5, line 25, after the word "banks," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "surplus," at the end of line 6, on page 6, and to insert:

Whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, nor more than is sufficient to meet interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges or losses of the system herein established, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and the Territories thereof. If there is more than one such bank in any city, town, or village willing to take such deposits upon the terms provided for herein, the same shall be divided among them substantially according to their capital and surplus. If no one of such banks in any such city, town, or village is willing to accept the deposits upon such terms, or if there be no bank or banks therein, or if the post-office at which the funds are received is not in a city, town, or village, then the deposits shall be made in a solvent bank or banks, subject to such supervision and examination, of the State or Territory in which the post-office is situated, giving preference to those that are in the same general community as the post-office receiving the funds.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask what is the question which has just been stated by the Chair?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] as amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest that the amendment I offered was an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and it was adopted upon a roll call; so that that question is not now before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands, if the Senator from Idaho will permit, that the amendment is the one printed in italics in the bill on page 6 as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Vermont is not the author of that entire amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from Iowa was the author of that amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation, I think, is this: The amendment pending and printed in the text of the bill is the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. To that amendment the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] proposed an amendment, upon which a roll call occurred. The amendment proposed was to add the words "or losses," and to strike out the last six words in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. So the question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as amended by the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the question, as I understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to, and the amendment which has been agreed to is a part of the amendment. That, the Chair understood, was offered by the Senator from Iowa. Possibly it was a committee amendment.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment agreed to consisted of the words "or losses," after the word "charges"——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. And then the striking out of the last six words.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. That has been agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the only amendment I have offered.

Mr. CARTER. That is the only amendment. That is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the Secretary report the pending amendment, and possibly the Senator from Montana can enlighten the Chair as to whose amendment it is. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 5, line 25, after the word "banks," it is proposed to strike out:

Subject to public supervision and examination in the State or Territory and as nearly as practicable in the immediate neighborhood in which the funds are received at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum. Where more than one such bank is available the deposits shall be distributed ratably among the banks as far as practicable on the basis of their capital and surplus—

And to insert:

Whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges or losses of the system herein established, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and the Territories thereof. If there is more than—

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the basic amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, as stated by the Chair. The amendment acted upon recently involved another motion by the Senator from Iowa, which has been put and carried.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the pending amendment is, as the Chair stated, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as it has been amended.

Mr. CARTER. As it has been amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a misapprehension, I am quite sure. The amendment now in italics, beginning with line 7, page 6, down to and including the word "funds," in line 8 of page 7, was offered by the Senator from Iowa, and was adopted a long time ago. The Senator from Vermont then moved to strike out a portion of that amendment and substitute that part which is found in large Roman letters upon page 6, and to that amendment I offered the amendment just suggested by the Senator from Montana, which was adopted upon a roll call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct. Now, the Chair is attempting to have the Senate act upon the entire amendment as amended up to the present hour.

Mr. CARTER. Has that amendment not been adopted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not since it was modified.

Mr. CARTER. So that that is the question to be put?

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment as it stands. On page 7, line 8, after the word "funds," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "funds," it is proposed to insert:

That postal depository funds shall be kept and held by the banks receiving the same as a separate fund, and no bank so holding such deposits shall loan any part of such fund for a longer period than ninety days.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I offer that amendment in view of the amendments that have been made, for the purpose of keeping the moneys collected through the post-offices in the neighborhood where they originate. The purpose of this bill comprehends just that thing. It is not intended that one part of the Government may seek secreted or hidden funds in another for its benefit. The spirit of this legislation is that money shall be brought out of hiding for the purpose of the community in which it is hid.

Mr. President, that provision simply requires of necessity that the fund realized through the post-offices shall be a separate fund in the banks; that is, for identification—not the same note, not the same identical pieces of money, but the fund shall be kept as a separate account.

The restriction of time for which it may be loaned is intended to keep that money at home. The speculative market would not be anxious to take that money on a ninety days' loan, and there is more in that ninety days' limitation than may appear upon first glance. If the money collected in the neighborhoods through the post-offices is deposited in the banks, as provided for in this bill, as a separate fund, so far as the amount is concerned—and it can not be loaned for a longer period than ninety days—it will not travel very far from home, and it will be there for the uses and purposes of the community in which it had been hidden. If it was hidden in New York, let it stay there; if it was hidden in Nevada, let it stay there. I think it will be admitted that the speculative market far distant from the place where the money is discovered will not take it on a ninety days' loan, and, as I have said, I think that within that ninety days' limitation is a prohibition that will prevent the money from traveling very far.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Could not the ninety-day loan be renewed?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, yes; it could be renewed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And then for a second time?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but the money jugglers do not want money under those conditions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I call attention to the word "of," in line 6, page 7, following the word "examination." I think the word "of" should be stricken out and the word "in" inserted, so as to make it appear that this language does not exclude the examination of national banks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection whatever to the substitution of the word "in" for the word "of." I think the meaning would be exactly the same.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7 of the proposed amendment, in line 6, after the word "examination," it is proposed to strike out the word "of" and insert the word "in."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 7, page 1, after the word "for," it is proposed to insert the words "carrying out the provisions of this act in reference to," so that it will read if amended:

All regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act in reference to the receipt, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I also offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 19, after the word "deposit," insert the words "with the Treasurer."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 22, strike out all after the words "United States," down to and including the words "per annum," in line 13, on page 8, and insert the following:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a few moments. No proposition which has been before the Senate since I have been a member of it has given me as much trouble as the proposition involved in this bill. I find myself in this respect, as we are about to approach a vote, very much in the attitude of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who has so interestingly addressed the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. President, I believe that an overwhelming majority of the people of this country are in favor of a postal savings depository. I have been and I am in favor of a postal savings depository; but I have an abiding conviction that the depository which the people of this country are in favor of is a depository which will collect the scattered money of the various communities and make that money available for community enterprise and development, and not such a depository as will collect this money for the purpose of sending it away, to be used in speculation or deposited in distant centers in which they have no direct interest.

After weeks and months, Mr. President, of discussion extending through two sessions of Congress we had, I thought, whipped this proposition for a postal savings depository into a shape that would be satisfactory to the people and that would accomplish the purpose that the people had in view in demanding this character of legislation. We had formulated upon a bill that provided that the funds should be deposited in the banks of the neighborhood, and to clinch the matter the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] presented an amendment, and the Senate agreed to it, I think, with practical unanimity, in these words:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act.

The last, however, meant, I take it, to pay the expenses of the administration of the system. With the bill in this form I had made up my mind to support it if I could find constitutional authority for its enactment. I addressed myself to the investigation of the constitutional question, which I will not now discuss further than to state my ultimate conclusion. I reached the conclusion, as the result of these investigations, that the power to enact this legislation was not conferred upon Congress by the commerce clause of the Constitution; that it was not conferred by the general-welfare clause of the Constitution; nor was it conferred by the power to establish post-offices and post-roads.

But, Mr. President, I also reached the conclusion that this power was conferred upon Congress—I do not say I reached it without any doubts or misgivings, but whatever were the doubts or misgivings as to my conclusion I decided I would give the people who I believe want a system of this sort the benefit of it—under that clause of the Constitution which empowers Congress to coin money, because it seemed to me that the power to coin money necessarily includes the power to put that money in circulation and keep it in circulation by all proper and necessary means for accomplishing that purpose, and that this bill was fairly an appropriate means for the accomplishment of that end.

At this stage of my troubles with reference to this bill the President of the United States, in a solemn deliverance, declared that these postal funds would be needed for the purpose of paying off the bonded indebtedness of the United States, and that unless these funds were deposited in the national banks or devoted to the payment of the national bonds the bill we have under consideration would be unconstitutional. If the President is correct in his statement of the law, then, Mr. President, from my standpoint, if we pass a bill that the people want, it will be an unconstitutional bill, and if we pass a constitutional bill, it will be such a bill as the people do not want.

Mr. President, I do not agree with the President, and I do not believe a majority of those on the other side of the Chamber who are advocating this legislation agree with the President in his opinion as to the constitutionality of this legislation. But it is manifest that the majority in this Chamber, responding to the suggestion, if not the command, of the President, have made up their minds to take out of this bill the original Smoot amendment, which guaranteed that the deposits should remain in the communities in which they were earned and saved, and without which understanding the people of this country would never have declared themselves in favor of this system, and never have declared themselves in favor of this legislation, and to insert in the place of it provisions different, it is true, from those of the Root amendment, but which can be used and employed to indirectly accomplish the very same purpose that the Root amendment would accomplish, namely, the investment of all postal savings funds in government securities. This bill in the shape in which it is now being framed will be merely a prelude to a central bank.

Mr. President, I wish to say, in conclusion—as I said I merely wanted to state my position upon this matter—that if this bill is allowed to remain as it was before the President's interference with it; if the original Smoot amendment, which provided that when these funds were once deposited in the bank, loaned to a bank, they should not be taken out of the bank except for the purpose of paying a depositor or defraying the necessary expenses incident to this legislation—if that amendment, with a general provision that the funds shall be deposited in the neighborhood in which they were earned and saved, remains in this bill, or provisions which will accomplish that purpose remain in this bill, I am going to vote for it.

If not, if the proviso which the Senator from Utah has just offered is adopted, a provision which, in my judgment changes the whole character of this legislation—which will provide for taking the money out of the communities in which it has been earned and saved, and defeat the purpose and will of the people in demanding this kind of legislation—then I shall vote against this measure, as great as I believe would be the benefits of a properly adjusted bill establishing a postal savings-bank system to the people of this country.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. GORE. I will yield for the present. I wish to submit an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah as follows: Strike out the words "when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in time of war, if in the judgment of the President an," so that the proviso if amended in that manner will read:

Provided, That in time of war, if in the judgment of the President an exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment of the Senator from Utah strike out the words "when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in time of war, if in the judgment of the President an," so that if amended the proviso will read:

Provided, That in time of war, if in the judgment of the President an exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, etc.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, a question. As I understand the amendment, it amounts substantially to striking out of the amendment of the Senator from Utah the words "or other exigency involving the credit of the Government."

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment I propose limits the exercise of the power of the President or of the board of trustees to a time of war, so that the funds deposited in the banks throughout the country can not be withdrawn for the purpose of investing them in the bonds of the United States or other securities of the United States except in time of war. The difference between the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Utah and as it would be if amended by the suggestions I have made is this: I think we are all agreed that in time of war every other consideration must yield to the public safety, and those of us who favor the policy of keeping these moneys in the communities in which they are gathered in the post-offices recognize that there may be an emergency of war to which this policy must yield. But the amendment of the Senator from Utah proposes to repose in the judgment of the President or of the board of trustees possibly the determination of a wide and indefinite question, namely, a condition that may involve the Government's credit.

As I said with regard to another amendment to which I spoke a few moments ago, there is no man who can define what is meant by "an exigency involving the credit of the Government." What to me might be an exigency might be to another an unimportant and trivial detail or disturbance. If we intend to keep these moneys in the States and in the banks where they are originally deposited, then nothing but the supreme necessity of war should be permitted to overthrow that policy.

It must be remembered that it is always in the power of Congress to deal with these deposits as we see fit, but if we believe in the policy which we are inaugurating we ought not to permit any department of the Government to overthrow that policy. I am not imputing to any officer of the Government a sinister motive. I am not suggesting that any future officer of the Government will be animated by a sinister purpose. But I am hopeful that we may make the policy which we are crystallizing in this law effectual; and we ought not to permit anybody to say that an exigency involving the Government's credit has arisen which authorizes the withdrawal of these funds from the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am interested to know how the Government would fortify itself by converting money which was already available to it into government bonds. It would add nothing to the volume of money. The Government may now call for this money and use it. How would it be benefited by converting it into bonds?

Mr. CUMMINS. That question ought to be directed toward those who originally inspired the amendment which I am seeking to amend.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was directing it——

Mr. CUMMINS. I see all the force of the inquiry. I do not believe the amendment ought to become part of the law at all——

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not accomplish anything.

Mr. CUMMINS. But inasmuch as there is difference of opinion with respect to a certain point which it is thought this amendment will cover, I have been willing to go just so far as we can go in safety to the interest of my own State in accepting or agreeing to the suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to add a word?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, if we take the money and invest it in bonds, we must retire the money. That merely finishes the thought I suggested.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is very great weight in the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, but I do not intend to discuss it either on the one side or upon the other. All I want to do is to make it impossible, save in time of war, that the moneys which have gone into these banks and which have become part of the financial and industrial conditions of the communities in which these banks exist shall not be withdrawn upon either the whim or the judgment of some officer of the Government that an exigency has arisen which involves the government credit. It is impossible for me to conceive of an exigency of that kind.

I do not know what is meant by those words, nor I fancy does any Senator know with such certainty as that he would be able to give a definition. Therefore we ought not to accompany this bill with so vague and so uncertain a standard. If we intend to put this money into the banks and keep it there so long as the banks are willing to pay the interest that may be required, and so long as they are willing to give the security which the law exacts, let us adhere to that policy. If, on the contrary, we are seeking some way in which those who are not in harmony with that policy can destroy it and withdraw the money, then, as was so well said a few moments ago, let us do it squarely and honestly and divide upon the issue which that proposition would necessarily create.

I do not intend to enlarge upon this subject. I had not intended to extend my observations to the point that I have now gone. But I recognize in this bill, as I think everybody else does, a twofold purpose: First, to provide a place for the deposit of savings on the part of those who for one reason or another will not use the banks of the country; second, to insure the largest possible circulation of our money; that is, by keeping the largest possible proportion of our money at work.

We have agreed, apparently, that the money shall be deposited in the banks. Therefore I hope we will not agree to a proposition which will enable those who do not concur in our policy to overturn and destroy it.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask for some information from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The amendment of which he gave notice a day or two ago, or yesterday, I think it was——

Mr. SMOOT. Yesterday.

Mr. BACON. Was one which inserted the proviso, which is found in the last amendment offered to-day, beginning in line 22, after the word "States," and ending in line 5, after the word "California." As I understand, the amendment which he offers to-day goes further.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me explain that.

Mr. BACON. Let me finish the sentence, if the Senator will pardon me.

I understand the amendment which has been offered to-day goes further and strikes out not only the part mentioned in the original amendment proposed by him or of which he gave notice, but extends so that it includes all down to line 13, after the words "per annum." Am I correct in that—that that is the present amendment; that is the amendment offered to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the amendment offered to-day.

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me for a minute, I understand that the additional which is stricken out, and which has heretofore been adopted, was an amendment offered by the Senator from Utah. I want to read those words in order that they may appear in connection with what I have to say. The amendment which was previously offered by the Senator from Utah and which was adopted was in these words, found on page 8 of the present reprint of the bill:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and to pay the rate of interest prescribed from time to time by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2½ per cent per annum.

The amendment offered by the Senator to-day strikes out those words and removes from the bill that peremptory command, if I may so denominate it. The amendment of which he gave notice yesterday did not strike out those words, but the amendment which he has offered to-day, and which is now pending, does strike out those words.

Mr. SMOOT. I can explain to the Senator from Georgia how that happened. If he will notice the bill that was printed on February 3, 1910—he may have a copy on his desk——

Mr. BACON. No; I have not.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the bill we had under discussion, and the only one or the latest one printed up to last evening, and I offered the amendment yesterday afternoon, taking the bill as printed on February 3, 1910. If the Senator will procure a copy of that bill he will find that my amendment strikes out the amendment offered by me and found in that bill on page 7, beginning in line 15. But in the reprint, which was ordered printed after I offered the amendment and is on the desks of Senators now, that amendment comes on page 8. My amendment, as I offered it last night, strikes out the same words of the February 3 print that it does the print of last evening. I changed the amendment, as I offered it to-day, to correspond with the bill that is upon the desks of Senators, of the print of last evening.

Mr. BACON. I will state that I am not so particularly concerned by the fact that the Senator has offered an amendment to-day different from the amendment he offered yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not different.

Mr. BACON. I say I am not concerned by there being or there not being any such difference, but I am concerned in the fact that the Senator has stricken out the amendment which he had previously offered in the Senate and which the Senate had adopted—that is the fact and the pertinent fact—the command that these deposits should not be removed from the neighborhood or local banks, and under the plan here now is to be utterly abandoned, and not only are we to have stricken out the proviso which is contained in an amendment now pending before the Senate, but we are to have that which is entirely consistent with the proviso also stricken out, to wit, the words I have just read.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator will take into consideration the first amendment and the second amendment offered by me, he will find it reaches the same result as the amendment originally offered by me, with this exception, that the money may be withdrawn in case of war or where an exigency exists involving the credit of the United States.

Mr. President, I want—like nearly all other Senators, I will say western Senators at least—this money to remain in the banks in the communities in which the money is deposited.

The bill with my original amendment required the money to remain in the bank forever if the banks were willing to pay the rate of interest prescribed and not withdrawn by the depositors. This appealed to me, as a business man, to be unjust. The bill did not provide a way for the Government to withdraw the money from the banks on any account, at any time, or for any purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Is this amendment offered for the purpose of affording some means of getting the money out of the banks?

Mr. SMOOT. The proviso is for this purpose: In case of war, I take it, there is no Senator who would say that the Government should not use the money; and I also take it that if there is any condition of affairs in this country that would involve the credit of the United States the Government should have the right to withdraw the money.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Utah if this amendment is offered for the purpose solely of affording a means by which to carry on war or to protect the credit of the United States? Is that the object and purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. To enable the Government to use the money, if necessary, for those purposes is the object and purpose I have in offering the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Just one other question, Mr. President.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. SMOOT. I will add further, that I am reminded also of the fact that a number of constitutional lawyers think it would make the bill constitutional. I am not going to express an opinion upon that, because I am not a constitutional lawyer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MONEY (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.). I will ask the Senator from New York if he will yield to me to suggest to the Senator from Montana that we take a recess, to preserve the legislative day? It is getting late; everybody is pretty tired; we have been absorbed here in the debate all day; and if it suits the convenience of the Senator from Montana that course would forward the bill very much.

Mr. ROOT. Certainly; I will yield.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator from New York will not be incommoded, I will ask the Senator from Montana if he will not make a motion for a recess?

Mr. CARTER. I doubt if it will be possible to reach a vote at any reasonable hour this evening. After consultation with a number of Senators I find that it would be quite impracticable to keep a quorum here during the evening, or, at least, it could only be kept in the Chamber at great inconvenience to Senators. Seeming to be the general desire, I will make a motion that at 6 o'clock we take a recess until to-morrow. I think probably we ought to continue until 6 or thereabouts, and I will move that the Senate then stand in recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CLAPP. If we are going to have a recess, we may just as well take it at 5, which will accord with our usual arrangement.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. At 5.

Mr. CARTER. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that he will get any sort of accommodation he wishes on this side. There is no intention in the world to delay the measure, and he will get unanimous consent for almost any hour he wishes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he does not think it practicable to get a vote within an hour or two?

Mr. BACON and others. Oh, no!

Mr. CARTER. I would gladly remain here throughout the night in order to get a vote. But I understand that it is the disposition of Senators to take a recess at some later time in the afternoon. I think, however, that we should continue until 5.30. There are Senators here who desire to address the Senate on the pending amendment, and it would be just as well that they should proceed now.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he will not agree that the vote shall be taken this afternoon?

Mr. CARTER. I do not anticipate a vote on the bill.

Mr. MONEY. I do not mean on the bill; I mean on the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. From information I have there are a number of Senators who desire to address the Senate. I have no idea that a vote can be taken on the pending amendment this evening.

Mr. BACON. I understand that the purpose is not to press the session longer than probably 5 or 5.30, and I do not think there ought to be any restraint upon what we shall do between now and then. If we are to continue in session, we ought to continue without any agreement as to voting or not voting.

Mr. KEAN. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that we take a recess at 5.30 o'clock.

Mr. CARTER. I move that at 5.30 o'clock the Senate shall stand in recess until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Could not the Senator modify that to the regular hour of meeting? There are some very important committee meetings to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have one.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that as to-morrow will be the same legislative day, and I do not suppose there is any possible doubt about the question that we will come to a vote to-morrow, there is no reason I can see for any earlier meeting than the usual hour.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Can not the Senator from Montana extend the time until 11.45?

Mr. CARTER. I will change the hour of meeting at the expiration of the recess to 11.30 to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana, that at 5.30 the Senate shall stand in recess until 11.30 to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there has been any agreement about taking a vote now?

Mr. CARTER. There has been none.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in order to make it entirely clear as to the deposit of government moneys in banks I have communicated with the Treasury Department. I find that under a circular or order issued in December the securities for government deposits are United States bonds, including those which are guaranteed by the Government, or substantially guaranteed; United States bonds, District of Columbia bonds, Porto Rico bonds, Philippine government bonds, are accepted as security at par; Hawaiian bonds at 90 per cent, Philippine railway bonds at 90 per cent of the market value.

That is the present regulation. For a time under the administration of Secretary Shaw municipal and other bonds were accepted, but I find no warrant for the statement that any other kind of security or collateral has been received at the Treasury Department.

There is, as is generally known, a difference between the disposition of money collected at the customs offices and that at the internal-revenue offices. Collectors of customs transmit the amounts received by them immediately and directly to subtreasuries of the United States. Collectors of internal revenue deposit at government depositories, where the rule is that if the amount of the deposit exceeds the value of the bonds deposited by the bank, then the balance must be immediately transmitted to the Treasury.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a proposed amendment to the bill which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that it may be once more read, both the original amendment and the amendment proposed to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the original amendment and the amendment thereto.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 22 of the bill, after the words "United States," it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits are received: Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State or Territory in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings-bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State or Territory as are made the subject of investment of savings-bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California: Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed, from time to time, by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2½ per cent per annum.

And in lieu of those words to insert:

Provided, That when in the judgment of the President war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] proposes to amend the amendment as follows: After the word "That," in the proviso, strike out the words "when in the judgment of the President war or any other," and in lieu insert "in time of war, if in the judgment of the President an," so that if amended the proviso will read:

Provided, That in time of war, if in the judgment of the President an exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] or the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], or both. If there is a war scare, which I am not looking forward to in the immediate future, and this money is all withdrawn and invested in bonds of the United States, and if these poor depositors want their money, just what is the modus by which they would get it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think inasmuch as the Senator from Utah is the author of that part of the proviso, I will allow him to answer.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will add that, in my judgment, if the President concludes we are going to have a war, you will find these poor depositors tumbling over each other to get to the banks to withdraw their money. They will not take any chances; and I think we had better give them that privilege.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I answer so far as to say that Congress alone has the power to declare war?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I assume that in that contingency, if that dire event should occur, Congress will take proper care of these deposits in some way or other.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, answering the Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to say that any depositor can withdraw his money at any time he makes the demand upon the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States will have to provide money to meet those demands, whether it be in time of war or in time of peace.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Can the Senator imagine a situation where the Congress of the United States, in the event of war or the imperiling of the credit of the Government, would not take appropriate measure to protect either of these?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any question but that the Government would take care of the deposits.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is true, then, just exactly what is the point of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. The point of my amendment is that the money shall stop where it is deposited, unless in case of war and the credit of the Government is involved.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought this bill was intended to provide for the poor. Certainly you do not think that in a case of war the savings of the poor ought to be first appropriated by the Government. They are generally the men who fight the battles. We ought to require the other men to furnish the money to buy them the guns to fight those battles with.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator certainly knows that under the provisions of the bill the poor, if they have their money deposited there, draw 2 per cent interest.

Mr. BAILEY. But they might need it before the war was over. War lasts sometimes a long time, and it might be they would starve if they had to await the conclusion of hostilities before they could withdraw from the Public Treasury their hard earnings.

Mr. SMOOT. There is nothing in the amendment which says that the Government of the United States shall not pay the depositor in time of war.

Mr. BAILEY. But it authorizes the Government——

Mr. SMOOT. Every depositor must be paid in time of war or in time of peace.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; there is nothing in the bill that says that during a war they shall be paid. The commissioners fix that.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill provides that depositors shall be paid upon demand under certain regulations made by the trustees.

Mr. BAILEY. The depositor then gets the money back without any interest. He must leave his money there for six months or else he is not entitled to any interest.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same requirement made by savings banks to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. He gets the money back under regulations. What are those regulations? Nobody knows unless it is somebody who can search the heart of those commissioners, and I hardly think the President of the United States could do that before he appoints them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the old bill where it required a six months' notice. In the present bill there is no requirement of a six months' notice.

Mr. BAILEY. That is six months' limitation as to interest? I may be mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. As to interest.

Mr. BAILEY. If a man draws it at the expiration of five months he loses his interest. Of course he would not lose much.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator from Texas that there is no such provision in the bill. There is no limitation at all.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps I have been misled by one of the old bills for the present bill. They have been changing the bills so often that I have not been able to keep up with them. If I had, I would not have been able to keep up with anything else that was transpiring in Congress. They have changed this every time they have introduced it. I do them the credit to say they have improved it in this regard—that every time a man made a speech against it and pointed out some defect in it, when there was a new bill, they left that provision out, just as you left out the provision about special exemption from taxation and special exemption from garnishment.

But you know perfectly well that without that in the bill these post-office receipts are not subject to taxation. They have no right to issue them except in execution of some power of the Government, and no evidence of indebtedness issued in the execution of such a power is subject to the taxation of a different sovereign. You also know that the Government will not allow itself to be drawn into the ordinary courts of the country in a garnishment proceeding. So you have answered the argument against them by cutting them out, but you do not relieve your bill from the effect. These changes are my excuse for having supposed that the Senator did provide that there should be no interest unless the money was left on deposit at least six months.

Mr. CARTER. There have been something like 200 bills all told presented to the Congress in the last thirty-seven years.

Mr. BAILEY. And no two of them alike?

Mr. CARTER. I think dozens of them are substantially alike, one being a reproduction of another, as the Senator will find if he reads them; but that is a dry class of literature, and I would not inflict that upon the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not catch the last observation.

Mr. CARTER. I observed that I would not have the Senator inflicted with the task of reading over those bills, because they constitute a very dry class of literature.

Mr. BAILEY. If you would read one you would have them all?

Mr. CARTER. There have been, it is true, two prints of the bill now under consideration, and some confusion naturally occurs between the two prints. One contains all amendments made up to a certain time and the other no amendments at all, because it constitutes the original print.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to interrupt the Senator to withdraw what might appear a criticism of the committee's efforts to improve this bill. Instead of that being a proper subject of criticism, it is entirely to the credit of any committee of this body, and I think that if we all had less pride of authorship and exhibited a greater willingness to improve a measure when we could we would improve our legislation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah a question in connection with this amendment. I ask him if he ever heard in the history of war or in the history of finance of any government buying its own bonds or anybody's else bonds with cash during the continuance of the war?

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, then the money never would be withdrawn from the banks for that purpose. But I can imagine a combination of circumstances where, perhaps, this amendment would be a saving clause, as it were, to the Government. Suppose we had hard times like, for instance, in 1893 or 1894, and at the same time war was declared and the Government was compelled to sell bonds, and, to sell them, should be obliged to provide a rate of interest, say, of 10 per cent, would the Senator think that it would be a bad business proposition for the President to authorize the trustees to withdraw the money from the banks, perhaps not right at that time on that particular week or month, but within a year, and redeem the 10 per cent bonds and remove the heavy burden from the Government? There could be a combination of circumstances where it would be very proper, indeed, for the Government to use that power, and that is one of the powers that the bill confers by the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Utah pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GORE. After a moment, unless the Senator insists.

Mr. CLAPP. I merely want to say that the proposition does strike anybody as absurd to buy bonds in time of war. What this bill ought to provide for should be a clear-cut provision that in time of war the funds should be used by the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. A forced loan from the poor.

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; not a forced loan because of the obligation of the Government to the depositor his legal status could not be affected one particle by that change.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator tells me that in ordinary times they can get it on demand. If the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon me, I am going to renew my effort to ascertain the truth. I want to know the provision in this bill where we authorize the depositor to get his money on demand.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to misconstrue what I said. I said that the depositor under this bill can get his money on demand in time of war or in time of peace.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand; but the schoolmaster will recite the page.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator is desirous of getting the direct information from the text, I call his attention to section 7 of the bill, which reads——

Mr. BAILEY. On what page?

Mr. CARTER. On page 5 of the last print. Section 7 reads:

> That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, now, that is exactly what I said a moment ago, and I did not think I had misread the bill; but out of deference to those who were in charge of it I did not contend for it. The very first section provides for the investment, custody, and repayment of the money under such regulations as the trustees may prescribe; but nowhere does the bill say that the depositor shall have his money on demand, but he must withdraw it under such regulations as these trustees prescribe.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, undoubtedly——

Mr. BAILEY. Let us put in there "on demand."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the Senator's pardon for having interrupted him.

Mr. GORE. All right, sir; I enjoyed the colloquy. I agree entirely with the first suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I believe that no nation in the history of the world ever bought bonds during times of war. It is a universal practice, as it is an uncontrollable necessity, that nations must sell bonds during war rather than buy them.

The Senator made allusion to the panic of 1893. If I remember, during that crisis this Nation sold bonds; it did not buy bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator concede that the Government could sell these bonds to the board of trustees in time of war and receive the money?

Mr. GORE. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. SMOOT. I say does the Senator think that it would be impossible for the Government of the United States in time of war to sell bonds—government bonds—to the board of trustees? They have control of the money and investments.

Mr. GORE. I do not understand that that is the purpose of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The board of trustees is invested with authority to invest this money, and if they want to invest it in government bonds they can do so.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, is it the purpose of the amendment to invest these deposits in bonds now outstanding?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment does not provide that they shall be bonds that are in existence to-day or bonds that may be hereafter issued.

Mr. GORE. Would it authorize the investment of these deposits in bonds now outstanding?

Mr. SMOOT. In case the President thought that conditions existed to authorize the board to do it, then they could buy bonds that are now issued.

Mr. GORE. That is the provision of which I complain.

I wish to add that during the panic of 1907 this Government felt constrained to sell bonds rather than to buy bonds. I do not indorse the suggestion that these deposits shall be made available for the immediate use of the Government in the contingency of war, but it would certainly be a better resource to provide that the Government might use these deposits in the prosecution of war, rather than to authorize these trustees to invest the deposits in the bonds and securities of the United States.

Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator further if under the provisions of his amendment the bonds now outstanding could not be purchased with these deposits exactly as they could be under the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they could be purchased by the board of trustees, providing such conditions arose as are mentioned in the amendment, and in no other case.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in the discretion of the President could the money be used in the purchase of outstanding bonds? That is the question.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the restrictions named in the amendment——

Mr. GORE. In the event the banks had been buncoed——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President, there is nothing about banks being buncoed.

Mr. GORE. I believe from the language of the President of the United States——

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that has nothing to do with the amendment. We are discussing the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Very well. What I am driving at is this: Can these bonds be palmed off on the Government in pursuance of this amendment, as suggested in the circular read to the Senate by the Senator from Iowa?

It seems to me that the discretion is vested entirely with the President to make these purchases at any time that he believes or imagines the exigency has arisen, and the plan outlined in the circular and read to the Senate by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] could be carried out under the terms of this amendment. The other amendment was frank in its avowal. This, if it means what I have suggested, is veiled. It does seem to me that, however innocent may have been the intention of this amendment, it certainly fulfills the advice of Macbeth when he said:

* * * look like the innocent flower,
But be the serpent under 't.

I merely wanted to arrive at the truth.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I was engaged in asking a question or two of the Senator from Utah when other Senators wished to ask questions. I now wish to conclude them. I asked the Senator if he could imagine a circumstance, either in case of war or where the credit of the Nation was imperiled, where Congress itself would not take steps to protect either the safety or the credit of the Nation, and he said, "Of course not." Then I asked the Senator what was the point of his amendment, and he said to keep the money in the localities where it was collected. Now, bringing those queries and answers down to the present point, I wish to ask the Senator if his original amendment, which is now a part of the bill, does not accomplish that exact end?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my original amendment accomplishes that; but it goes further than that. It makes it mandatory upon the Government that the money shall stop there forever. There is no provision to ever draw it from the bank.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the Senator now provides that it shall remain there forever except in the emergency of war or except in the emergency of the endangering of the national credit. Is not that the case?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the substance of the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That being true, the Senator admitting that in either one of these supreme emergencies Congress itself would be swift to relieve either the safety or the credit of the Nation——

Mr. SMOOT. I said Congress could do it; but Congress may not be in session.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It could be called quickly in case of war or danger of war, could it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course Congress has to act before war can be declared.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So, as a matter of fact, the Senator's new amendment does not modify the Senator's amendment which the Senate has already adopted and which served the purpose of keeping the money, so far as legislation can keep it, in the community where it was needed, so that it might be used by the people and the merchants, except under these two emergencies, which the Senator admits Congress itself, representing the Nation, would be quick to relieve.

Mr. SMOOT. Could relieve.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Could relieve. I think that sums up the queries that I have to propound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I should like to hear the amendment read before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment. Does the Senator desire only the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proviso it is proposed to strike out the words "when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "in time of war, if, in the judgment of the President, an;" so that, if amended, the proviso will read:

Provided, That in time of war, if, in the judgment of the President, an exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to suggest the absence of a quorum unless it is necessary, but I do not think we want to vote on this amendment to-night.

Mr. HALE. There is a quorum here.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, upon that point, if the Senator will permit me, I myself thought a vote should be taken when the Senate was all here, but upon the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that undoubtedly no vote would be reached upon the amendment to-night, it is clear to all that many Senators have left the Chamber and that a full vote can not be had. Otherwise, I should be the first to insist upon an immediate vote, which I thought ought to have been had at that time. But I do not think it is exactly fair to Senators, who acted upon the faith of the general understanding that no vote could be taken to-night, to have a vote now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Montana said that he had no doubt there would be no vote on this amendment to-night; otherwise I should have highly desired it, and the RECORD will show that I suggested at the time of the proposed recess that a vote should be then taken, because at that time everybody was here. Since then, I have no doubt, upon the understanding that the Senator from Montana was speaking quite accurately that no vote would probably be reached to-night, it would not be fair to take a vote when Senators under those circumstances have left, as we see they have.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this is entirely a new thing in the action of the Senate. When an agreement has been made by unanimous consent that a vote shall be taken on a certain day—sometimes the hour being fixed and sometimes not—and Senators having made their arrangements accordingly expect to be here, and are here, to vote. I have never known, by any postponement or by any device, that unanimous-consent agreement to be changed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know that the Senator from Maine was here when the unanimous-consent agreement was made, but it was expressly stipulated that the final vote should be taken on a legislative day rather than a calendar day, and the words "legislative day" were put into the agreement for the purpose—and that statement was made at the time—of giving every Senator an opportunity to speak, and that if we did not conclude it on the first day there would be a recess taken to the next. That is part of the agreement.

Mr. HALE. That I did not know. I was not here at the time, and unless something of that kind interposed, I should certainly object. The thing that has brought the Senate to a vote, in the absence of a previous question which some of us do not believe in, is the iron-clad rule, never to be deviated from, that when a day is fixed for a vote or an hour is fixed, upon that day nothing else whatever shall interpose. I was not present when the agreement was reached, but if, as has been stated, it was a part of the understanding that the vote might not be taken during the session of the day—Thursday—but might be postponed by recess, of course that is a very different thing, and I do not object to that. For one, however, I shall always insist when an agreement is reached for a vote on a certain day that no unanimous-consent agreement after that can change it.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is quite right.

Mr. HALE. I think every Senator here understands that is the safety of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is entirely right about that. I was satisfied he did not know the exact terms of the agreement.

Mr. HALE. I did not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator may have been out at the time, but the situation is exactly as the Senator from Georgia stated it was, plus——

Mr. HALE. That entirely satisfies me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Plus a motion made by the Senator from Montana, on the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, that we should take a recess, thus prolonging the legislative day. At that particular juncture, for the reason that the Senator has stated and because all Senators were here, I suggested that possibly we might have a vote upon this particular amendment. Since then, however, many Senators have left. That is the only reason I suggested that the matter go over.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should not want this to be taken as a precedent simply because the motion is made to continue the legislative day, unless it had been a part of the original agreement——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was.

Mr. HALE. Because that is a device to carry things over to another day; but, as that was part of the original agreement, of course I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] very accurately stated the understanding which was reached at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into, and, having that understanding in mind, the motion was made at the solicitation of numerous Senators for a recess until the stipulated hour to-morrow. I said at that time that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and numerous other Senators present desired briefly to address the Senate. I doubt now, without changing any unanimous consent or attempting to change it, whether it will be possible to reach a vote on any amendment before the hour fixed for the recess to begin.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I think I will withdraw any objection. I would not agree to any hour being fixed to vote on anything to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire merely to consume the time of the Senate for the purpose of consuming time; but I have an intense desire to know something more about this amendment before we are called upon to vote.

The objects and purposes of a bill of this kind were clearly defined and stated when the Congress convened, and it has been thoroughly understood before the country as to why we were endeavoring to legislate upon this subject; and that was for the purpose of furnishing a means by which the less provident and more careless and less informed people of this country might have a place in which to deposit their savings. I was thoroughly in sympathy with that policy and that principle, and I am still.

We commenced legislating, therefore, upon the theory that there was a necessity for this kind of legislation based upon that principle. Now, we have reached the point where it seems that we are legislating not so much for that, but to prepare against the exigencies of war and of the impairment of the national credit.

The bill as framed, otherwise than this proviso changes it, is satisfactory to most Republicans and, I presume, to a great many upon the other side. At least it is in thorough harmony and in thorough accord with the declaration of principles which we made to the people when we asked them for a reassurance of power; but there was one principle thoroughly understood and discussed at all places where this measure was discussed at all, and that was that this measure should not be used as a means by which the money collected in the different localities should be transported to foreign parts or foreign places. That was the matter upon which the people in my part of the country were interested and which they discussed; it is a matter which is of prime concern to a vast portion of the country, and I have no doubt but that some would rather see the bill fail than to have that principle preserved in the measure which we pass.

The bill, therefore, as drawn, as I have said, is satisfactory upon the first principles which were enunciated with reference to this legislation, but this proviso is not as yet satisfactory even to the friends of this measure, and no one has undertaken to defend this proviso before the Senate; no one has undertaken to say why it should be in here. There may be a good reason, a controlling reason, and a reason which will satisfy all of us who wish to support this measure, but it has not yet been submitted to the Senate. No one contends, so far as I know, that it is necessary in order to render the bill constitutional. I know that that rumor has been thrown out, but no one has assumed the responsibility of saying here in the Senate that this great measure, this entire superstructure of credit and business, must depend for its constitutionality upon a single proviso in the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I say, without the slightest hesitation, that if this bill were to be passed as it was reported by the committee, the Supreme Court of the United States will, without any doubt, hold it unconstitutional.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas, I presume from the manner of his reply, misunderstood my statement. I said that no one had undertaken to say that this measure could be made constitutional by this proviso if it were otherwise not so. That is what I intended to say. Do I understand the Senator from Texas to contend that this proviso renders the bill constitutional when otherwise it would not be? I do not think that the Senator from Texas, or anyone else, will contend that if the measure is unconstitutional without this proviso, it is constitutional with it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if he will read the oleomargarine case I think he will thoroughly agree with me that it is possible to impose on the court. The Senators who passed that oleomargarine bill knew perfectly well that they were passing it for the purpose of regulating or suppressing the manufacture of a given article in the States, but when that matter reached the Supreme Court they said that Congress has the power to levy taxes and that they had no power to search the hearts of the legislators to see whether they intended to collect revenue through that bill or whether they intended to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I will do so if the Senator will allow me a moment. I am entirely familiar with the oleomargarine case, but the Supreme Court held that Congress had the power to do that which Congress did do. As to the motive and purpose which actuated Congress in doing that the court held that they would not inquire into that.

Mr. BAILEY. They held that they could not inquire into that.

Mr. BORAH. That they could not, but they held——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, I stated in a discussion of that bill that it was unconstitutional, but when I was asked the question if the court would hold it so, I said "no," because the court is confined to the consideration of the law as it appears. What I mean to say is this: If the Congress were to declare that its purpose in passing this bill were to borrow money or to use the postal savings banks as a fiscal agency of the Government, the Supreme Court would have no right or power to say Congress did not mean that.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator perfectly, but in the oleomargarine case the Congress was exercising the power of taxation, and the Supreme Court found that they had the power to legislate as they did. The purpose of exercising that taxing power upon that particular occasion they would not inquire into.

Mr. ROOT. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to make a brief remark?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Idaho has stated that no one has defended the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. There is lying upon the table an amendment to this bill which I introduced on the 8th of February, which has not been withdrawn. My friend the Senator from Idaho has been misinformed upon that subject. I intend, with the indulgence of the Senate, to say something to-morrow morning, at the end of the recess, upon the subject of that amendment and the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was perfectly aware that the amendment which has been referred to by the Senator from New York had been offered. It is upon our desks, and it is still here; but what I said was that no one had yet undertaken in the Senate to defend these matters upon constitutional grounds. I understand now that that is to be done to-morrow morning, and, as the hour of half past 5 o'clock has arrived, I will wait.

RECESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 5.30 has arrived.

The hour of 5.30 p. m. having arrived, the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, March 4, 1910, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the Journal corrected in the matter of a vote. I am recorded on page 2640 of the RECORD of yesterday, and I suppose the Journal corresponds, as not having voted; and I am recorded on page 2641 of the RECORD as being paired and not voting. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, I was present, was not paired, and I voted "yes" on that question. I desire that the Journal shall stand corrected and that my vote be recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD and the Journal will be corrected accordingly.

The Journal was approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Articles of War filed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of high privilege, but there is a question of personal privilege pending that was postponed until this morning. Will the gentleman withhold for the present?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

The SPEAKER. On Tuesday last the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] arose to a question of personal privilege, and after some discussion, by unanimous consent, the matters involved in the alleged question of personal privilege were printed in the RECORD of Tuesday. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] interposed the point of order that the matter therein contained does not constitute a question of personal privilege. In the meantime the Chair has very carefully examined in the RECORD the statements or allegations covering the alleged question of personal privilege, and the Chair is ready to rule upon that question.

The rule of the House defines questions of personal privilege as those affecting—the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members, individually, in their representative capacity only.

The meaning of the words "representative capacity" involves the whole question at issue. Is a letter, written by a Member to a private individual to explain acts of the Member in his "representative capacity," itself an act in that capacity? If it is, then any other act of his in explanation outside the House, as a campaign speech in his district, is an act in the "representative capacity." It seems to the Chair that to extend the right to occupy the floor of the House as to so wide a range of controversy as that between the Member and the newspapers or between the Member and the public generally as to his letters or his addresses outside the House would vastly incumber the proceedings of the House.

As to the portions of the article in question referring to acts of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] in his "representative capacity"—that is, in relation to his acts on the floor or in a committee—it seems to the Chair that there is nothing which goes further than a mere criticism of such acts. There is no charge, so far as the Chair finds, which accuses the gentleman from Minnesota of corrupt acts or any other conduct implying more than error of judgment.

The precedent of 1890, to which the gentleman from Minnesota referred the Chair, appears, on examination, to have been a case wherein a Member read in Committee of the Whole a letter from a citizen assailing other Members for words spoken in debate. The Chair held that one of the assailed Members was entitled to the floor on a question of privilege. That case was therefore very different from that presented by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Chair now holds that the gentleman from Minnesota does not present a question of personal privilege.

The Clerk will read from the record, as made up from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a statement of the precedent of 1890, which is in full. The precedent as inserted in Hinds's Precedents gives another point in the case and neglects to cover the question under consideration. The Chair directs the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A Member having read in Committee of the Whole a letter from a citizen assailing certain other Members for words spoken in debate, the Chairman held that one of the Members assailed was entitled to the floor on a question of privilege.

On May 17, 1890, Mr. Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, having the floor in debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had read in his own time a letter from a citizen, James Campbell, of Pittsburg, Pa., in which the following language occurred:

"I see by the Associated Press report of the proceedings in Congress yesterday that Messrs. McMillan, Bynum, and Wilson made an attack upon me personally."

The letter then proceeds to explain the writer's relations with the Members referred to, and concludes:

"Bynum can not scare anyone, and if he and Mr. Wilson had been honorable men they would have made counter affidavit and produced it in rebuttal to the one made by me. Nothing better, however, can be expected of the party that is made up of men whose sole aspiration is to assail men of good character, to shield themselves, and then cowardly attack a man in the House of Representatives who is not present to defend himself, and such proceeding only shows the contemptible methods of the men, their intentions, and their party."

Mr. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama, raised a question of order as to the letter, and Mr. William D. Bynum, of Indiana, who had been mentioned in the letter, demanded the floor for a question of personal privilege.

Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, made the point of order that no question of personal privilege was involved.

The Chairman held that the letter reflected on the gentleman in his representative capacity, and constituted a question of privilege.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, pending an appeal from the decision of the Chair, I would like to say that there are other and additional facts in connection with this matter which the published article does not contain, and I would like to state the facts that render this publication a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read very carefully from the RECORD.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but the Chair has not read what I was going to say to the Chair and the House in addition.

The SPEAKER. What the gentleman himself might say is not material touching a matter that had its genesis outside of Congress, based upon a letter which the gentleman wrote and a newspaper criticism. The Chair rules upon the article submitted by the gentleman——

Mr. STEENERSON. I have additional matter.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And printed in the RECORD. The point of order having been sustained, the gentleman would not be in order to address the House unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have additional facts to this publication, and I desire to raise a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. But that has been settled. If the gentleman desires to raise a new question of personal privilege, the Chair could not prevent him, if he would.

Mr. STEENERSON. If I have papers and documents in my possession presenting a question of privilege outside of the letter published, it seems to me I am entitled to present it—a letter in which it appears that I am intimidated in my capacity as a Representative in this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the precedents touching the matter referred to.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will submit the facts which I will sustain by documents. I am ready to state them now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled on the question of privilege presented by the gentleman on Tuesday and printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent. The Chair at present can not rule on anything different from that presentation and upon that question of privilege under the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Whether or not I am now entitled to present a question of privilege with new evidence of documents in my possession and facts, which I will bring within the rules, that I have been intimidated as a Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that possibly there is a ruling upon that question, and is causing the precedents to be examined. The Chair, however, would say to the gentleman that in the absence of a precedent the Chair would be inclined to hold that that question of privilege is disposed of. As to whether the gentleman may have another question of privilege, the Chair is not informed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then I make a new point now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds in the Index this language:

All points of order shall be stated before a decision is made.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am prepared to state the facts that constitute a question of privilege, and, with the permission of the Chair, I will do so now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion, under the precedents referred to, that as to the point of order on a question of privilege submitted to the Chair and decided by the Chair, that that is a closed incident.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am trying to make the Chair understand that there are other facts relating to the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. This was a decision on appeal to the House, a little different, but apparently involving the same principle:

A question of order just decided on appeal may not be renewed on the suggestion of additional reasons.

Now, the gentleman, of course, has the right to appeal from the decision of the Chair on the point of order. If the gentleman does not do so, the decision would stand. But as to any other question of privilege, the Chair is not informed and can not rule upon it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the facts that I am about ready to state, and will state upon my responsibility as a Member of this House, constitute facts which affect my independence as a Member——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman now is putting a supposed case to the Speaker. If the gentleman desires to raise a new question of privilege——

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that will be the shortest way out of it. I raise the question of personal privilege, and I state that:

Whereas the Merchant Marine League of the United States, whose headquarters are at Cleveland, Ohio, has an executive committee, of which the following-named persons are members: J. G. Butler, jr., of Cleveland, Ohio; Myron T. Herrick, of Cleveland, Ohio; J. J. Sullivan, of Cleveland, Ohio; John A. Penton, of Cleveland, Ohio; M. Andrews, of Cleveland, Ohio; E. C. Converse, of New York City; Samuel Mather, of Cleveland, Ohio; F. F. Prentiss, of Cleveland, Ohio; Ambrose Swasey, of Cleveland, Ohio; James H. Dempsey, of Cleveland, Ohio; Edward Hines, of Chicago, Ill.; D. Z. Norton, of Cleveland, Ohio; Abraham Stearn, of Cleveland, Ohio; George H. Worthington, of Cleveland, Ohio; Frank Billings, of Cleveland, Ohio; A. F. Estabrook, of Boston, Mass.; W. P. Murray, of Cleveland, Ohio; M. A. Potter, of Indianapolis, Ind.; and D. A. Tomkins, of Charlotte, N. C.; and

Whereas said league has a branch organization in the State of California, of which R. P. Schwerin, vice-president and general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; John Barneson, of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company; George W. Dickie, general manager of the Union Iron Works; C. C. Moore, Albert E. Castle, and Andrew Carrigan, all of San Francisco, in said State, are members; and

Whereas said persons are engaged in issuing pamphlets, periodicals, and magazines devoted to the advancement and agitation for legislation to increase appropriations by Congress for ocean mail service and for ship subsidies generally; and

Whereas it is alleged that said persons have conspired and confederated together for the purpose of unduly and improperly influencing Congress and the Members thereof and creating hostility against all persons opposed to said legislation——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows that what he is reading now does not form a question of personal privilege.

Mr. STEENERSON. Wait until I get through.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, wait until the gentleman gets through. He is getting in a good deal of matter——

Mr. STEENERSON. I will show that I am threatened.

The SPEAKER. So far as the gentleman has proceeded he is stating a question that might affect the House generally, but a question of general privilege is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. STEENERSON. The same rule covers both.

The SPEAKER. And in such cases the practice of the House has been that the gentleman should present to the House a written proposition for action.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no doubt that he will do that at the end of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair will suggest that the gentleman would withhold until he is prepared to so present the matter.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is prepared to submit a resolution at the end of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, under the rules of the House, in the opinion of the Chair, before he makes his remarks touching a question of general privilege should send to the Clerk's desk and have read the foundation therefor. The gentleman will at once on mere suggestion see the propriety of that well-established practice.

Mr. STEENERSON. Read the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Whatever the gentleman desires.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to state this not only affects the House generally, but it affects me individually as a Member of this House and my action upon legislation pending herein.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman now knows the rule. He may send to the desk such written matter as he desires to be read, as part of his question of personal privilege.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well. I present the following.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Merchant Marine League of the United States, whose headquarters are at Cleveland, Ohio, has an executive committee, of which the following-named persons are members: J. G. Butler, jr., of Cleveland, Ohio; Myron T. Herrick, of Cleveland, Ohio; J. J. Sullivan, of Cleveland, Ohio; John A. Penton, of Cleveland, Ohio; M. Andrews, of Cleveland, Ohio; E. C. Converse, of New York City; Samuel Mather, of Cleveland, Ohio; F. F. Prentiss, of Cleveland, Ohio; Ambrose Swasey, of Cleveland, Ohio; James H. Dempsey, of Cleveland, Ohio; Edward Hines, of Chicago, Ill.; D. Z. Norton, of Cleveland, Ohio; Abraham Stearn, of Cleveland, Ohio; George H. Worthington, of Cleveland, Ohio; Frank Billings, of Cleveland, Ohio; A. F. Estabrook, of Boston, Mass.; W. P. Murray, of Cleveland, Ohio; M. A. Potter, of Indianapolis, Ind.; and D. A. Tomkins, of Charlotte, N. C.; and

Whereas said league has a branch organization in the State of California, of which R. P. Schwerin, vice-president and general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; John Barneson, of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company; George W. Dickie, general manager of the Union Iron Works; C. C. Moore, Albert E. Castle, and Andrew Carrigan, all of San Francisco, in said State, are members; and

Whereas said persons are engaged in issuing pamphlets, periodicals, and magazines devoted to the advancement and agitation of legislation to increase appropriations by Congress for ocean mail service and for ship subsidies generally; and

Whereas it is alleged that said persons have conspired and confederated together for the purpose of unduly and improperly influencing Congress and the Members thereof, and creating hostility against all persons opposed to said legislation; and

Whereas it is further alleged that in pursuance of the object and purposes of said conspiracy the said persons have raised by subscription and solicitation, from interested persons, a large sum of money, which has been used and is being used in said cause and in furtherance thereof; and

Whereas that pursuant to said conspiracy said persons, their agents, and servants having during the last two years frequently and repeatedly solicited and urged the Member of this House from the ninth district of Minnesota to favor and support said legislation and to express himself thereon; and

Whereas it is further charged that said persons, their servants, employees, and agents, in furtherance of said conspiracy, in October, 1909, sent money to a citizen of Crookston, Minn., where said Member resides, in order to obtain information about the private affairs of said Member, especially as to his travels and trips abroad during the last five years, and after obtaining said information said persons caused said Member to be informed that said information was to be used in articles to appear and to be published by said persons and said league in the public press, all of which was done or caused to be done by said persons in furtherance of said conspiracy and to intimidate, terrify, and influence said Member by fear to change his position on said legislation and to influence his vote and action in this House; and

Whereas it is charged that in furtherance of said conspiracy and in execution thereof said persons have caused the publication of the defamatory article, which was printed in the RECORD last Tuesday, March 1, 1910, and said persons in further execution of said conspiracy now threaten said Member with further defamatory and libelous articles and publications and to send numerous letters to citizens and residents of the said ninth district, defaming said Member and questioning his loyalty, patriotism, honesty, and fidelity, and otherwise, in letters and in the press, to libel and hold him up to ridicule and contempt, for the purpose of influencing his vote in the House; and that said persons are threatening to continue said blackmailing campaign in order to terrify and intimidate said Member; and

Whereas it is charged that in furtherance of said conspiracy large sums of money have been and are being used and expended to employ writers for the press to prepare articles favorable to ship subsidy for publication and to employ lobbyists to solicit and interview Members on said matter and to pay campaign contributions to political parties and organizations and influence election of Members and others; and

Whereas it is charged in the publications purporting to be issued by the said Merchant Marine League, and also in the Texas Farmer, a newspaper published at Dallas, in the State of Texas, that large sums of money and corruption funds have been raised by foreign shipowners and ship companies for the purpose of corrupting and influencing Members of Congress against said ship-subsidy legislation, and which sums and funds are now being used to improperly influence Members of Congress on said subject (see H. Res. 184, present session): Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate said charges, as to whether or not said conspiracy exists, and what funds have been raised by said conspirators for political agitation or for payment to political parties or organizations or to influence newspapers to create sentiment in behalf of the cause, and what, if any, threats of libelous or scandalous articles, or what, if any, other intimidations have been used or threatened on Members of the House in order to influence or affect their vote or attitude on said subject, and also to investigate what, if any, improper means have been used either to promote or defeat said legislation in Congress.

Resolved, That said committee be empowered to sit during the sessions of the House or during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to do all other acts necessary to fully carry out the objects hereof, and to report their conclusions to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman if he will be content to have that resolution sent to the Committee on the Judiciary——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. PAYNE. With the idea of his having a chance to be heard on the matter when the resolution is reported back.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the statement does not present a question of general privilege of the House.

Mr. MANN. As far as I could hear the resolution read, it does not charge any corruption on the part of any Member of the House. It charges that people outside of Congress have organized a conspiracy for the purpose of terrifying somebody, possibly Members of Congress.

Mr. STEENERSON. It charges they are terrifying them.

Mr. MANN. Maybe they are terrifying.

Mr. STEENERSON. By libel.

Mr. MANN. A charge that somebody outside of Congress is organizing a conspiracy for the purpose of corrupting Members of Congress does not raise the question of personal privilege or a question of general privilege, it seems to me. There is no charge made against Members of Congress. There is no charge made affecting Members of Congress.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not charged in this resolution that they have sought facts and pretend now they are going to publish them against this man if he does not vote correctly?

Mr. MANN. There is a charge in the resolution that they have sought to investigate the private character of a Member of Congress to be used against him. That is no charge against the Member of Congress in any way whatever in his representative capacity. If we should undertake to characterize as privileged every charge that was made that somebody was seeking to obtain information concerning the private character of a Member of Congress, entirely apart from his official duties, for the purpose of using that information against him when it has not been used so far as the charge is made, we would never end, and certainly that does not raise a question of privilege.

Mr. STEENERSON. It has been used. The defamatory article printed in the RECORD last Tuesday was published.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois has concluded, I would like to say a few words in reference to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said in reference to this resolution. It may not present a question of personal privilege, but if the statements contained in this resolution are true it undoubtedly presents a question of the highest privilege in this House, because the allegations contained in the statement sent to the Clerk's desk state that there are certain persons who have entered into a conspiracy to corrupt and intimidate Members of this House. Now, that may be true, or it may not be true, but that is not the question involved here at this time. The question is whether that statement—that there is a conspiracy being formed by certain men named by the gentleman from Minnesota to corrupt and intimidate Members of this House—does not raise a question of the highest privilege in this House. It seems to me that it clearly and manifestly must do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I could not distinctly hear the preamble and resolution, but from what I did hear the facts present themselves to me like this: The resolution simply charges that outside of the House of Representatives a conspiracy has been formed to commit a criminal act, to wit, to corrupt the National Legislature. That does not affect the privileges of the House, but it does present a subject for the investigation of a federal grand jury. It charges men outside of the House of Representatives with conspiring to perpetrate a criminal act. We are not to be corrupted. They have not affected us in any way, and I do not think that it affects the privileges of the House, in so far as I understood the resolution.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I desire to state to the gentleman that in addition to that the resolution charges that this conspiracy contemplates threats and coercion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And intimidation.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. And intimidation against Members.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If that is so, that conspiracy is an offense against the criminal law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Manifestly the gentleman's position in this matter is incorrect. Suppose the charge made by the gentleman from Minnesota is true and that there is a conspiracy to intimidate and corrupt Members of this House, is it not a question for this House to determine? Is it not for this House to protect itself? Manifestly it is. It can not be anything else. And if it is for this House to protect itself, and protect the membership of this House, then it must be a question of the very highest privilege and is entitled to consideration on the part of this House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I want to get the gentleman's judgment as to whether this language amounts to a personal privilege. The article referred to contains the following:

WHAT MANNER OF MAN IS THIS?

Is a man fit to hold high public office that will deliberately pervert and maliciously falsify the facts connected with any important public question? Is he a safe, a trustworthy man? We hold that he is not; that such a man is dishonest and an enemy to his country and his country's best interests, and that he and men like him are a constant menace to American progress at home and abroad.

There are not many such in Congress, but there will always be found a few, and the ninth district of Minnesota has one.

Now, the question is whether or not, if there is such a thing as personal privilege, this does not amount to it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The matter that the gentleman reads from the RECORD is disposed of, as a question of the general privilege of the House is presented by the resolution. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. I supposed I had the opportunity to be heard.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman insists on being heard, the Chair presumes he will still be with the gentleman after he has heard him. [Laughter.]

While the written statement which has been read at the Clerk's desk is exceedingly general, upon allegation, "it is alleged," and so forth, amounting, perhaps, to common rumor, yet there is one allegation in this statement, as follows:

And whereas it is charged in the publications purporting to be issued by said Merchant Marine League, and also in the Texas Farmer, a newspaper published at Dallas, in the State of Texas, that large sums of money and corruption funds have been raised by foreign shipowners and ship companies, for the purpose of corrupting and influencing Members of Congress against said ship-subsidy legislation, and which sums and funds are now being used to improperly influence Members of Congress on said subjects—

And so forth. Then follows the proposed resolution. It may be true, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], that if there be a conspiracy either upon the part of foreign shipowners or the Merchant Marine League to affect legislation, if such conspiracy in fact existed, the courts of law would have jurisdiction to proceed against parties who had formed the conspiracy, yet the allegation here is that these actions, on the one hand by the foreign shipowners for one purpose, and the Merchant Marine League for another purpose, are as indicated in the statement. The most specific allegation is touching the foreign shipowners. If it were not for the precedents, which the Chair has not had time to examine, except as referred to, the Chair might hold a different opinion.

The precedents are as follows:

A Member having stated, upon the authority of "common rumor," that another Member has been menaced, there was held to be ground for the action.

On April 20, 1848, Mr. John W. Palfrey, of Massachusetts, saying that he rose to a question of privilege, stated that common report had represented to the Members of this House that a lawless mob had assembled for two nights past and committed acts of violence, setting the laws at defiance and menacing individuals of this body and other persons residing in this city, and that he proposed to submit to the House a preamble and resolution thereon.

Mr. Thomas H. Bayley, of Virginia, raised the question of order, and inquired whether the recital of a fact, upon rumor, that a Member of this House had been menaced, could make it a question of privilege.

The Speaker decided that the allegation of the gentleman from Massachusetts raised a question relating to the privilege of Members, and that it would be for the House, and not for the Chair, to decide whether any breach of privilege was involved, or whether any steps were necessary for the protection of any of its Members.

In a later practice the Chair has made a preliminary decision, and then the House, upon that decision, has taken such action touching further inquiry or investigation as it deemed proper, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the preamble and the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the preamble and the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FASSETT. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask the House to cause the RECORD to be changed or corrected in one particular.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York desires to correct the RECORD, and the gentleman will state the correction desired.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry not to notice the presence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in the House, as it refers to his speech of yesterday. On page 2637 of the RECORD of yesterday, in the first column, Mr. RAINEY is reported as closing up the paragraph by saying:

And there the castings and the forgings are made by the poorest-paid skilled labor in the country.

He had previously made a somewhat similar statement in the same paragraph. As he was taking his seat I asked him if he wished to leave the RECORD in the form I had understood him to say, which, according to the stenographer's minutes, is this——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does the gentleman desire to do?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposes to correct the RECORD, as he has stated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is he proposing to change somebody else's speech?

Mr. FASSETT. Ah, Mr. Speaker, I am proposing to change somebody else's speech, because a change made after the speech leaves my remarks in a rather absurd position.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman he is talking about is not now in the House.

Mr. FASSETT. I observed that, and I stated I regretted he was absent; but I am perfectly willing to leave this for the present until the gentleman can be here, and I do not think he will object to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish the gentleman would.

Mr. FASSETT. Certainly, I will. Mr. Speaker, with the consent and the approval of the leader of the minority, I simply want to state what change I desire to have made, and then we will take it up afterwards. I desire to have the language in the RECORD correspond to the language the gentleman used on the floor, which was, according to the stenographer's minutes:

And there the castings and the forgings are made by the poorest-paid skilled labor in all the world.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois afterwards explained that he did not mean to use that language, and his explanation is in the RECORD, but the language ought not to be changed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the matter go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. FASSETT. There is no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SECOND AND ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOURTH ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 13410) entitled "An act to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13410) entitled "An act to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its first amendment.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and to the amendment of the Senate as to title, and agree to the same.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
M. G. BULKELEY,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was also read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The first amendment struck out the words "of the army" and radically changed the policy of the Government, and the Senate recedes.

The second amendment simply repeals article 123, as the article was virtually repealed by the change in articles 122 and 124, and the House recedes.

The House also recedes from the amendment to the title.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, within the last few weeks this country has achieved a notable victory in the award of the contract by the Argentine Republic for the building of two modern battle ships to the Fore River Shipbuilding Company, of Quincy, Mass., one of the great firms of this country, after open competition with the rest of the world. The award has occasioned a great deal of world-wide comment that has not been favorable to our people, because the true facts were not stated. Last night Admiral Bowles, who secured this contract, returned, and at a complimentary banquet given in Quincy by the people of that city gave his reasons why this country was successful in securing this important and epoch-making contract.

The ability of this country to enter the open market in South America and secure the lucrative business which those rich parts afford for trade and win off is strikingly illustrated in this signal success achieved by Admiral Bowles. It should serve as an inspiration to all other forms of business that seek a world trade and a market outside of this country, because for years it has been generally supposed that Great Britain had a monopoly in this one particular form of business. It has been heralded far and wide and, in fact, has been accepted almost as an axiom that England could build steel ships cheaper than any other nation. This theory is punctured and, I hope, dispelled forever.

If the shipbuilding industry of this country can compete with the other nations of the world and successfully underbid them in a department that heretofore has been regarded as impossible, why can not all our other forms of business likewise hope to compete with the same degree of success? Yes, with even a greater degree of hope, because in other lines the rest of the world does not claim to have the prestige over us which the English shipbuilders have always prided themselves upon.

The same degree of effort, energy, and well-directed zeal would unquestionably result in a continued series of industrial successes for this country that would quickly place us in an impregnable position so far as trade with South America is concerned.

The people of Quincy are justly proud of the achievement of Admiral Bowles and this Nation should also feel elated over the fact that from its Naval Academy and from its naval life there has stepped a man who has been able to enter into the commerce of the world and successfully and victoriously carry through a big business enterprise. It is another jewel in the crown of the maritime glory of this Nation and I trust is only the forerunner of a long series of mercantile marine successes that will follow from this time forth.

The shipbuilding industry of this Nation should receive a great impetus from this splendid work on the part of the Fore River Shipbuilding Company, of Quincy, and should inspire the building of many ships that will once more carry the American flag into all parts of the world and restore and vitalize an industry which was once the pride of this country. [Applause.]

At this time I also wish to call particular attention to the remarks of Admiral Bowles, in which he states that he was "exceedingly fortunate in having the assistance of the American minister, who, because of his training in business, made himself an efficient aid in securing the contract," and to the admiral's further conclusion that he is "in favor of diplomatic representatives abroad being drawn from among the politicians." This candid expression, coming at a time when everyone seems to condemn the man engaged in political life, is a thought which should not be overlooked, because of the part it played in this notable victory. While not wishing to be considered as opposed to a reasonable amount of civil-service regulations, such as is intended and sought by those interested in civil-service reform, I think it might be well to call the attention of this House to the remarks of Admiral Bowles, in which he says, referring to the American ministers:

I am in favor of them being politicians. I have no use for civil service in such matters. I used to be a civil-service reformer, but I believe that out of the battle of politics it is always possible to choose men of great ability, fine character, and good standing, and that they are the best ones to represent the spirit of the United States.

I think the victory was not only an industrial one, but also a diplomatic one, of which we were all very proud, and calls at this time for printing in the RECORD the story from Admiral Bowles himself. I ask unanimous consent to have this article containing the admiral's statement in the Boston Globe read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent, as the Chair supposes——

Mr. PAYNE. I object to the gentleman going on with a speech now.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I am through with it. I am simply asking that this be read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. PAYNE. I object to that.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman inserting it as a part of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his request?

Mr. O'CONNELL. I will; but I thought this such an important matter that the House ought to hear it.

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request and asks that the newspaper article may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I so modify it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

PRAISE FOR QUINCY MEN.

I suppose you expect me to tell you something about how we secured this contract, and I feel like talking more freely about that matter than ever before. You are entitled to my confidence. [Applause.]

There is no secret about it, and it is very simple. The whole credit of it does not belong to any one man, but the principal credit belongs right here in Quincy and to the magnificent organization of the Fore River Company. [Applause.]

The original designs were called for in January, 1909. We had at that time only ten days upon which to prepare the designs based upon very generous specifications. This was accomplished, and it was upon those designs—we ranked third in the competition—that I thought it desirable to visit South America.

While there I learned that the Argentinas in their wisdom had found many desirable features in many of the designs and wished to combine them in a more powerful and efficient manner, and they therefore requested, from the 23 original, new tenders.

I was able to communicate the bare information to the works; in fact, I only told them to have the designs ready when I reached London. A number of our competitors were discouraged at the short time available for the task, and our people had only eight or nine days, including Sunday, to work out these plans.

In that competition we came out No. 2. And, fortunately, they gave us another chance, and I called upon the works again to prepare a second set of plans, having acquired by that time sufficient information to do it in a better and more efficient manner than on the first occasion.

I want to assure you that nothing can equal the skill, energy, and devotion with which my boys at the Fore River worked upon those designs. I am gratified to tell you that a more perfect set of general plans never were prepared, and they were universally admired by the people to whom they were delivered. In that competition we came out No. 1. [Applause.]

REASON FOR SUCCESS GIVEN.

The question which many people have in their minds is how is it that we were able to underbid our foreign competitors when it is a general known fact that ships cost more in the United States than in England and in Germany. The answer is simple.

In the United States the cost of the production of large masses of steel is cheaper than anywhere in the world. The active competition which has existed among shipbuilders and manufacturers of steel and war materials has enabled the United States to build its battle ships cheaper than anyone in the world, so that all we had to do was to guarantee to deliver a battle ship up to the standard of the United States Navy and put on our regular price, and that did the trick.

My answer, therefore, is this: I shall be happy now and at any time to duplicate for the United States the ships for the same money and in the same time. The American shipbuilders, in this competition, all showed creditably. It is necessary in such an affair that the group representing this country should know their business and all our designers of the American shipbuilders made a creditable showing and they won.

We were exceedingly fortunate that in Argentina the United States was represented by a minister, appointed by President Taft, a man of great ability, a man well educated, trained in business, devoted to the interests of his country, not holding down the job, but working for the United States.

That man had acquired the Spanish language, had made himself acceptable to the people generally, and had won for us in three months a position such as North America had never held in that country. That man, Mr. Sherall, is the type and model of which the selection of our diplomatic representatives abroad should be based upon.

QUINCY YARD'S FUTURE.

I am in favor of them being politicians. I have no use for civil service in such matters. I used to be a civil-service reformer, but I believe that out of the battle of politics it is always possible to choose men of great ability, fine character, and good standing, and that they are the best ones to represent the spirit of the United States.

Now, one word about the Argentine Republic. You will receive in Quincy within a few days the beginning of a number of representatives of Argentina who are to come here to inspect their work, and I beg you not to forget that they are American.

They call us North Americans. They are a strong, able, distinguished, and cultivated people. They are worthy of every cordiality and hospitality and kindness that can be shown them. It is necessary that they should be made glad and want to stay, and we want them to come again.

This is not the last battle ship that we shall build in Quincy for South America. [Prolonged applause.]

PENSIONS FOR REGULAR ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report (No. 670) on the bill (H. R. 18006) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain sailors and soldiers of the Regular Army and Navy for printing, under the rules.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18006) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments in line 18, page 4, and line 12, on page 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate in lines 10 to 12, inclusive, on page 5, and in line 4, page 6, and line 6, page 6; and agree to the same.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
WM. H. DRAPER,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. J. MCCUMBER,
N. B. SCOTT,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The Senate recedes from its amendment, on line 18, page 4, the case of Thad Parrish. In this case the House allowed a rate of $16 per month and the Senate cut it to $12.

The Senate recedes from its amendment, on line 12, page 7, the case of Claudia D. Blakeman. In this case the House allowed a rate of $25 per month and the Senate reduced it to $16.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, in line 4, page 6, the case of Eugene Bourassa. This is a case in which the House did not fix any definite rate and the Senate fixed a rate of $12 per month.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, on line 6, page 6, the case of Charles F. Brown. The House did not fix any rate and the Senate made a rate of $12 per month.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, striking out all of lines 10 to 12, on page 5, the case of John D. Smith, in which the House allowed a rate of $30 per month.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21419) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned on Tuesday it had under consideration the appropriation for clerks in post-offices. The House struck out a provision on page 11, beginning at line 11. I wish now to offer an amendment, to go in immediately after line 10, on page 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert after line 10, page 11, the following:

"No liability for any amount in excess of this sum shall be contracted for salaries of clerks and employees at first and second class post-offices for services rendered during the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is offered as a limitation. It has been carried in the post-office appropriation bill for several years to prevent the expenditure of a greater sum for these services than the amount provided in the bill without further action of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, I think, is clearly subject to a point of order. The law now provides, in reference to clerks, that clerks shall enter on a salary of $600 a year, but that after being in the service one year, if their record entitles them, in the opinion of the department, to it, they shall be permitted to receive a salary of $800 a year; that after serving a year at $800, under the same conditions, they shall receive a salary of $900, and so on up to $1,100 a year. This amendment is perfectly contradictory of this provision of the law and says that no liability shall be contracted beyond the amount appropriated in here, although the law says that the salary shall be increased, and thereby a liability is contracted which, if necessary, would warrant a deficiency appropriation, or if the department should allow the promotions, would warrant the clerks making claims in the Court of Claims. So that the amendment is clearly legislation to limit a liability which, under the law, now exists, and it is not in any wise a limitation upon the appropriation in the bill.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is assuming a condition that does not exist. It is true there is a classification act, and it is true there are a number of clerks now in the department; and it is true that they may go on with their promotions and create a liability, if that would do it; but the fact is that it would not. This bill provides for the appointment of a considerable number of new clerks, and the effect of the limitation is that these appointments, in the administration of this bill, shall not be such as to involve the expenditure of a greater sum than is thereby appropriated. If all the clerks were in the department that were to go there, and they were to get stated salaries and their promotions fixed by statute, then, of course, a liability would have to be created to pay them. That is the substance of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois, but it does not present the facts. This merely amounts to a proviso—and I would like the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is listening to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. This merely amounts to a proviso that the appointments which may be made by authority of the bill—if there is money used to pay them—shall not exceed the amount appropriated in the bill, and the appointments will be limited by the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, take a case that may arise. I do not know whether it will arise or not. That has nothing to do with the point of order. Supposing the amount appropriated here were only $10,000,000 instead of $33,000,000. So far as the point of order is concerned, the amendment would be just as much out of order if the appropriation were $10,000,000 as it would be if it were $33,000,000; and yet there is not a man here but knows that if the appropriation in the bill were only $10,000,000, that amount would absolutely prohibit the department from enforcing a law now upon the statute books, not by a limitation on the appropriation, but by a limitation upon an existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman contend that if Congress had passed a law authorizing the erection of a public building at a certain amount that Congress would not have the authority in the appropriating act to appropriate less than the maximum amount carried in the original act granting the authorization?

Mr. MANN. It would.

Mr. STAFFORD. Wherein is the difference?

Mr. MANN. Why, you could appropriate here 5 cents for clerks, and there is no authority which could require you to appropriate more than 5 cents for the payment of clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very principle for which we are contending in this matter.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It is true these men may go to the Court of Claims and get judgment, but in that case we would not be required to appropriate the money for the payment of the judgment. There is no coercing Congress in appropriating for anything. But if you have an appropriation for a public building, as suggested by my friend from Wisconsin, it would not be in order upon an appropriation bill to say that the building shall not cost more than so much money. You can say in the appropriation bill we will appropriate no more money, but you can not fix the limit of cost upon an appropriation bill on a public building except on the public-building bill, which is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. All we attempt to provide by this provision is to limit the amount of expenditure during the coming fiscal year. We in nowise invade the liability of the Government to the clerks by reason of the automatic promotion scheme.

Mr. MANN. Why, the gentleman can limit the amount of appropriation by fixing the amount of appropriation, but he can not limit the liability of the Government under the existing law or fix the liability over a point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to believe that the gentleman from Illinois would occupy the time of the House on a proposition that he does not understand, and even more difficult to believe that if he does understand his assumed basis of argument, that he will attempt to deceive the House. Both horns of the dilemma are hard.

Mr. MANN. And nobody will believe either one.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, if the Post-Office Department was fixed and stationary in regard to its force, if all the clerks were there to-day who were going there under this bill, and if the statute fixed their salaries, and this provision was not enough to cover it, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would be right, but that is not the proposition at all. We are providing a certain amount of money in this bill for additional clerk hire. The number to be employed is uncertain. One end of the problem is and must be in the air, because if they should appoint all the additional clerks that the money would allow, if they were appointed for nine months it would require one sum, for six months another, and for three months another.

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER. And one-half another.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes; and one-half another. So that all this limitation does and can do is to limit the administration in the expenditure of this item as to the people not now under salaries and subject to automatic promotion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from New Jersey offers the following amendment:

No liability for any amount in excess of this sum shall be contracted for salaries of clerks and employees at first and second class post-offices for services rendered during the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made.

He claims that this amendment is in order, on the ground that it is a limitation. In the opinion of the Chair the House can not, on a general appropritaion bill, authorize a contract; neither can it forbid one.

Where an amendment places a limitation which would not otherwise exist upon the discretion of one of the executive departments of the Government, forcing the head of that department to do certain things which otherwise he would not be required to do, that is more than a limitation upon an appropriation. It is substantially a positive enactment.

It seems to the Chair that this amendment is legislation, and not in order under our rule on a general appropriation bill. He therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 10, page 11, insert:

"The sum herein appropriated shall be subject to the following limitation: That the number of clerks to the payment of whose salaries the amount herein appropriated may be applied shall not exceed 33,200 at any one time."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph until I can examine it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MANN. As far as I am concerned, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. What is meant by the amendment is that it shall limit the number of persons who may be paid out of this appropriation to 33,200 at any one time.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I reserve the point of order on the amendment, and I should like to ask the gentleman what the effect of his amendment is? How much does it reduce the number of clerks carried in this bill, or does it increase the number, or in what way does it affect the paragraph?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It limits the number that shall be in the service and paid out of this bill at any one time to 33,200.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. How does that number compare with the total number carried in the bill?

Mr. MANN. It is the same number.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It is the full number.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Then the effect of this amendment, as I take it, is the same as the effect sought in the last amendment—to prevent the appointment of additional clerks. I insist upon the point of order. I should like to be heard, if the Chair desires to hear me.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If the gentleman insists on the point of order I want to state what the amendment does. If you appropriate so much money for clerk hire, that may be used to appoint one number for nine months; if they are appointed on an average of six months, it is another number; and if they are appointed for three months, it is another number; and if appointed for one month, still another number.

Now, the important point in the limitation is this: That all that are appointed during the fiscal year are carried to the roll at the end of the year and are put under the classification act. The limitation there is intended to limit the number that may be appointed under this bill and carried to the permanent roll in the next fiscal year and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, according to the ruling of the Chair now, except by general statute.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. This is, in effect, as the Chair stated in regard to the last amendment, an effort on the part of the gentleman from New Jersey to limit the discretion of the executive officer. The professed and avowed purpose of the amendment is to prevent the Postmaster-General or other proper official from increasing the number of clerks carried in this paragraph; and inasmuch as by statute this official is authorized to appoint carriers in his discretion, this is certainly an attempt to limit his discretion.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks leave to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of this appropriation shall be applied to the force of clerks of the classes herein appropriated for exceeding in number 33,200.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment that it still comes within the ruling of the Chair previously made. While it professes to be a limitation on the appropriation, in effect it is a positive enactment to prevent an executive officer from increasing the number of clerks. It does not matter in what shape you put the words of the amendment, if the object of the amendment is to prevent the Postmaster-General from putting more clerks on during the life of this appropriation bill. This is professedly and avowedly the object of the amendment. If the amendment is so drawn that it affects the purpose, it is a limitation on his discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that under the precedents the amendment as now offered by the gentleman from New Jersey should be held to be a limitation. It has been held that an amendment providing that no part of an appropriation for the army shall be available for an army over a certain size was in order on the ground that it was a limitation. The Chair, following this precedent, overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he will not add to his amendment the words "at any one time," so that it shall read: "Not more than $3,200 at any one time."

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I have no objection to that, and I ask unanimous consent to add to my amendment those words.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I also offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the last amendment the following:
"The sum herein appropriated shall also be subject to the following limitation: That the allowance of salaries for the several grades in the various first and second class post-offices shall be made, so far as practicable, in proportion to the amount of the business transacted at the several offices."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Add after the last amendment the following:
"And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the last amendment the following:
"And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum."

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is a limitation on the amount appropriated. In nowise is it a limitation on the discretion of the executive officer. By this amendment we provide that in no instance shall the total amount appropriated be exceeded in expenditure. It means, in effect, that the Postmaster-General shall not employ any more post-office clerks than what this total amount will provide; and under the precedents of the House, to which I wish to direct the attention of the Chair, I think it is clearly in order.

I direct the attention of the Chair to the Manual, section 826, as found on page 417 of the latest issue, in which the following language is used:

The limitation may not be applied directly to the official functions of executive officers, but it may restrict executive discretion so far as this may be done by a simple negative on the use of the appropriation.

I direct the Chair's attention particularly to this language, referring to the scope of limitations:

But it may restrict executive discretion so far as this may be done by a simple negative on the use of the appropriation, which does not give affirmative directions.

Numerous precedents are cited as found in volume 4 of Hinds's Precedents, namely, paragraphs 3968 to 3972, 3854 to 3859, and 3975. I have those precedents before me, and I would like to call the attention of the Chair to some of them in which the phraseology has been even broader in extent, and yet the Chair in those instances has overruled the point of order.

Reading from page 657 of volume 4 of Hinds's Precedents, paragraph 3968, when the post-office appropriation bill was under consideration on April 12, 1906, and the following paragraph in the bill was under consideration:

For inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service and newly established offices, $7,100,000.

To which the following amendment was offered:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served entirely by the extension of the Rural Delivery Service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of a new star-route service for a patronage which is already entirely served by rural free delivery.

Then there is a further proviso relating to Alaska, which is not pertinent here. A point of order was made against the amendment, and the Chair overruled the point of order.

Again, I call the attention of the Chair to the citation in the following paragraph, 3970, when the post-office bill was under consideration at the same time:

For railway post-office car service, $5,875,000.

To which the following amendment was offered:

Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be expended for the payment of rent of railway post-office cars not in actual use in the service of the transportation of the mail.

The chairman, who was the present Vice-President, overruled the point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the case first instanced to the Chair there is a direction and limitation even on the executive discretion of the Postmaster-General, but it is negative in its character in restricting the expenditure of that money, except on routes of the character described, but in the amendment that is now under consideration there is not even any such restriction.

There is merely a direction that he shall not employ clerks so as to involve an aggregate expenditure of the amount herein designated. There is not in anywise any limitation on his discretion, but merely the exercise by Congress of its right to limit the amount of the appropriation. I could call the attention of the Chair to other citations, but they are along the same line. I think that the Chair on giving consideration to these citations will agree that this is in nowise a limitation on the discretion of the executive officer, but merely a limitation on the appropriation, so that he may not expend any more than the total amount. I have other citations here along the same line, even broader than the one under consideration, but all the citations go to the extent that this character of limitation may be upheld on an appropriation bill. Otherwise Congress is without any authority whatsoever to limit the amount that may be expended or the number of men that may be employed. If the Chair would like to hear further citations, I will be glad to cite them.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this amendment calls for the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder. Now, if we strip the paragraph of everything except that which deals with the appointment, let us see how the gentleman's argument sounds then. The amendment then would read—that the appointment of clerks hereunder shall be so made as to not involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum—

Which is tantamount to saying to the Postmaster-General that he shall not, within the life of this bill, employ more than a certain number of clerks. Now, if the committee desires to do this, there is nothing to prevent it from decreasing the total amount of the appropriation, but inasmuch as the statute places in the Postmaster-General discretion as to the appointment or nonappointment of clerks, as to the number that shall be appointed during the year, this is obviously an attempt to limit that discretion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. It seems to me that the decisions cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] had no application to the proposition now pending. Those decisions are simply to the effect that Congress may, in making an appropriation, put a limitation upon the uses of an appropriation; and there can be no question about that; no one controverts it. But here is a limitation, not upon an appropriation, but a limitation upon the amount which may be expended by a department under existing law where the law warrants that expenditure. The department has certain discretion. This is a limitation, not on the appropriation—it does not pretend to limit this appropriation at all—but is a limitation upon the amount of liability which the department may incur under existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is one which gives affirmative directions to an executive officer and interferes with his discretion. Under the precedents of the House it violates the rule that no legislation is in order on an appropriation bill. Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment No. 5 to the bill (H. R. 18681) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4399. An act for the relief of Maj. Pierre C. Stevens;

S. 3360. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900;

S. 1. An act authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

S. 5705. An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers, 10, at $1,200 each; 4, at $1,100 each; 3, at $1,000 each; and 6, at $900 each; in all, $24,800.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I understood the last amendment, which carries the language commencing on line 11, went out on the point of order—or what became of that language?

The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph went out on the point of order yesterday.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The language from line 11 to line 20 was included in the last point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It went out yesterday on the point of order. The language of the whole paragraph was ruled out yesterday on the point of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, at the end of line 20——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to make the point of order that we have passed that.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I was on my feet and failed to obtain recognition when the amendment was disposed of by the ruling of the Chair. The gentleman from Wisconsin offered an amendment, after the word "sum," in line 13, and when that was disposed of I endeavored to obtain the recognition of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the gentleman was on his feet seeking to gain recognition, but the Chair thought the gentleman expected to offer an amendment at the close of the reading of the paragraph, so the Chair therefore will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what paragraph of the bill does the gentleman seek to offer his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not yet been reported. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, on page 11, after the last amendment, the following:

"That the clerks in post-offices of the first and second classes shall be required to work not exceeding forty-eight hours each week, including such number of hours on Sunday and intervening holidays as may be required by the interests of the postal service.

"That clerks shall be required to work in shifts of eight consecutive hours, or as nearly so as practicable.

"That should any clerk or clerks provided for in section 1 of this act be employed more than forty-eight hours during any week they shall be paid extra for the same in proportion to the salary they are receiving.

"That all clerks and carriers shall be entitled to an annual leave of absence of thirty days with pay."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that that amendment was offered day before yesterday, was discussed at that time, and I made the point of order against it. At that time the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. But this is a much better amendment than the one offered day before yesterday, and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will admit it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee briefly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to say in response to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads that this is not the same proposition that was offered here day before yesterday and which went out on the point of order. While that was a very excellent amendment to the post-office appropriation bill and a decided improvement, Mr. Chairman, with due deference to the gentleman having this measure in charge, this is a far better amendment, and, as the members of this committee are attempting to have general legislation placed upon it, I think the doors ought to be thrown wide open to other Members who are not so fortunate as to be members of that committee, so that they may have an opportunity to amend the bill and give us some legislation upon an appropriation bill, for, in my judgment, if we do not get it there, we will not secure it at all.

I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to let this meritorious proposition go on this bill, and enable us to do justice to a very large, worthy, and deserving class of efficient postal employees.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Tennessee admits that this is general legislation. I agree with him in that conclusion, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It changes existing law, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 700, at $700 each; 600, at $600 each; in all, $850,000.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I note the absence from this item of the laborers in the $500 class carried in the previous bills. Has that service been done away with, or have these men been promoted?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, in the bill for the current year there were provided 660 men in this class at $700 a year, 425 at $600 a year, and 140 at $500 a year. The committee, after examining the conditions under which this labor is employed, concluded that $500 a year was too low a rate of pay for these men, and therefore increased the $700 grade by promoting 40 men to it, making 700 in that grade, and raised all of the men in the $500 grade to the $600 grade, leaving the bill with 700 men at $700 a year and 600 men at $600, eliminating the $500 grade.

Mr. KELIHER. I wish to congratulate the committee, and I hope that next year we may note the absence of the $600 grade, and to see $700 as the minimum salary paid to laborers in this class of work. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, and insert the following:

"For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 350 at $800 each, 350 at $700 each, 600 at $600 each; in all $885,000."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from New York wishes to make a statement, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, possibly the point of order will not lie, because the existing grades as they are in the law are changed, and therefore the paragraph being itself subject to a point of order, an amendment to it is not subject to a point of order. But I do not desire to address myself at this time to that. I think there is an impression in the minds of the Post-Office Committee that these laborers are employed in what you might call "lumping"—that is, simply the rough work—and there is no question that some of the laborers are so employed. With a due consciousness of my responsibility as a Member, I hesitate to say that I have actually seen with my own eyes laborers in the post-office in New York City doing the work that clerks are doing, but it is my very strong impression that the postmaster has pointed out to me men there doing the work. I have read the hearings and am familiar with them.

Mr. WEEKS. Are you discussing the merits of the point of order?

Mr. BENNET of New York. At the moment, the merits of the proposition. I can state almost of my actual knowledge of having seen these people that are being employed as laborers and being paid these inferior salaries doing the same work of clerks, and alongside of the clerks, in the basement of the post-office of New York City.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. These are supposed to be laborers. Is the gentleman aware that while in the postal service they get $700 a year, and if they work under the Treasury Department in the same work they only get $600 a year?

Mr. BENNET of New York. There are a few laborers in the custodian service in New York City that get $600, and I know they are not under the Post-Office Department, of course.

Mr. MANN. All the cleaners, all the laborers in charge of the building, if they happen to be janitors in a postal station, get $700 a year; but if they are janitors at the main office, under the Treasury Department, they get $600 a year.

I think the gentleman ought to direct his attention, along with some of the rest of us, to having the inequality done away with by increasing the salary of some men doing the same work for the Treasury Department before he boosts salaries under the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am paying a little attention to that also. But I think that the committee very possibly has an idea that these people who do clerical work in the main building are under the Post-Office Department, when, as the gentleman from Illinois and myself know, they are under the Treasury Department, and that the postmaster is custodian. I simply want to bring to the attention of the chairman of the committee what I think he does not realize, and what I am trying to show is what the evidence given before his committee did not clearly convey, and that is that these laborers are men in a superior employment; that they handle the mail; that they do clerks' work, and that there ought to be, for a few of them at least, a superior classification to the $800 grade.

Mr. MANN. They receive the mail when it comes in.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly; right along with the clerks, not lumpers, but men of superior intelligence and education, who simply happen to have been appointed as laborers. They are intrusted with the handling of the mails the same as the clerks. They are under oath, and there ought to be an $800 grade to which the best of them could be promoted.

On the point of order, it seems that the $500 grade being abolished—on which I congratulate the committee, and which is a step in the right direction—and it seems, if my position is correctly taken, almost unfair to take advantage of their liberality; but the $500 grade being abolished, being a change, the paragraph would thereby in itself be subject to the point of order, and an amendment to it under the recognized precedents of the House is in order. Last year there was a $500 grade. This year there is no $500 grade, and therefore the amendment, while otherwise it would be a change of law, being offered as an amendment to a paragraph subject itself to the point of order, is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that this paragraph is not a legislative provision.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There is legislation by abolishing the $500 grade. Last year there was the $500 grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has the right not to appropriate even for a legal object.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I quite agree with that. An appropriation for that purpose would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. An appropriation for that purpose, if offered by the gentleman, would be in order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I quite agree with that, but it seems to me it might be in order through an amendment such as my colleague's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

This item is curious in this respect, and I want to call the attention of the House to it. It primarily carried the salary of $500 a year for laborers. One of the reasons for the abolition of the $500 grade was that the department could not get men to apply for $500 places. It has often been said on the floor of this House in defense of salaries comparatively low that there is no trouble in getting men to fill the places at a stated salary, and consequently the salary must be sufficient. Here is a case where, in the course of business, in respect to a standing salary, it is stated by the department that it is so low that men can not be found to take the places provided at that figure.

For compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, at a rate above $300 each, and not to exceed $1,000 each, $300,000.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he is satisfied that this amount appropriated in this paragraph and the succeeding item will be sufficient to make these promotions in substations which will be made under the existing regulations of the department?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, in the item to which the gentleman from Illinois calls the committee's attention the committee has recommended the estimate made by the department. It is the same amount appropriated last year. There is no question about its providing for the necessities of the service. There is an increase in the succeeding item of $45,000, of which $25,000 was recommended by the department and $20,000 was added by the committee.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman it may not have come before him, in his very arduous work in reference to this bill, and many other propositions pending before his committee, with reference to these substations.

Of course in a city like Chicago, and in the district which I have the honor to represent, the people are mostly dependent on these substations for post-office connections at all, except as the mail is delivered to them. The department has had a practice of increasing the amount paid to a clerk in charge of a substation in accordance with the amount of business transacted, which, as a rule, is computed on the number of money-order and registry transactions. In the past those regulations have been several times changed, because the amount appropriated was not sufficient to make the increases in the salaries provided by the regulation of the prior year. And it would seem as though where a clerk takes a substation for the first time at $100 a year, as is the usual practice, and where we have great difficulty very often in our city in getting people to take those substations at that rate for the first year, that if their business increases so that they do an amount of business which would warrant the payment of four or five hundred dollars a year, under the regulations of the department, they ought to receive that amount of salary. And if that is to be done in one case, then a sufficient amount ought to be appropriated to do it in other like cases.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct in saying that the method which determines the pay of these clerks at substations has been changed; but a clerk at one of these substations takes the appointment, not on account of the salary paid, but on account of the business which it brings to him in other ways. That is the reason that drug stores are so largely the representatives of the Government in such cases; and the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in referring to the question, stated that very largely these clerkships would be taken for the second reason, which I have named, even if no salary went with the clerkship. In other words, that the main reason in accepting these positions is not the salary, but is the business brought to the individual on account of having an office in his store.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the First Assistant Postmaster-General is mistaken in that respect so far as my district is concerned. He could not secure the location of these substations in the drug stores in Chicago without paying some compensation. It is true that the compensation paid is not sufficient, and is not intended to be sufficient, to compensate for the extra amount very often paid in clerk hire by the owner of the drug store. Nor is it true that that is the reason why drug stores are selected. Drug stores are selected in the main because the department and the postmaster will not locate a substation in any place except a drug store. They dislike to locate a station elsewhere. The gentleman thinks, and I know it is the popular expression, that people seek these places. It is not an infrequent thing in my district to have a man throw up a substation and for the department to be unable for a considerable period of time to find anyone who will take it.

Mr. WEEKS. That may be true of the district represented by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. It is true elsewhere.

Mr. WEEKS. But all the testimony before the committee is to the contrary; and the department, in my judgment, has had no trouble in obtaining clerks for these substations.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much testimony the committee has taken. I dare say it has taken very little on this subject. The truth is that the department officials in Washington have very little knowledge in reference to that matter. I went to the department a few years ago and asked them if they knew of any place in the United States with a population of 10,000 people where a postage stamp could not be bought, and they said they did not. I said, "Well, I can name you one in my district, where you can not buy a postage stamp." The storekeepers would not keep stamps for sale.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Why not?

Mr. MANN. There was no person willing to maintain a substation. There had been a number of people in charge of substations and all had thrown them up because of the great amount of work. In that particular case it was on account of foreign money orders. They start a new man in at only $100 a year. In all fairness to the department I will say that in that case, upon proper presentation of the matter, the department started a man at a salary considerably in excess of $100 a year, although that was a violation of the usual practice, and I agree with the gentleman that as a usual thing that is the proper practice.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the gentleman desire to make a motion on this subject?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not wish to make any motion. I wanted to know whether the committee was endeavoring to provide a sufficient sum to comply with the regulations which the department makes with reference to these substations.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I suspected from what the gentleman from Illinois said that he had not read the hearings on this subject.

Mr. MANN. To ease the gentleman's mind, I will say that I have not read the hearings, and that I do not expect to.

Mr. WEEKS. The hearings on the subject were very full, so that every member of the committee was satisfied that the appropriations made under the two paragraphs were sufficient for the needs of the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is only fair to the committee, in view of the inquiry directed by the gentleman from Illinois, to state that the amount appropriated in the first item is not sufficient to provide for the present salaries according to the present established rate of pay based upon money orders and on registered packages. At the time of the hearings the annual rate of appropriation for these contract stations, where the compensation is from $300 to $1,000, was $296,000. And in the following item, where the compensation is $300 and below, the annual rate was $530,000, which in both instances was very near the total appropriation of the present law. I directed an inquiry to the First Assistant Postmaster-General to ascertain whether his estimate of $300,000 in the first paragraph, the same as the present law, would compel him to establish an increased rating for this service if no additional appropriation was made. He said that would necessarily follow.

I then asked him concerning the next appropriation, in which his estimate was $560,000, an increase of $25,000 over the existing appropriation, and which the committee increased an additional $20,000, making it $580,000—whether that would not require a higher number of pieces to be handled in order to obtain the same compensation, and he said that it would.

I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois and other members of the committee that these stations perform a most valuable work, a work that could not be duplicated to any degree for the same cost if they were under the direct charge of the Government.

The committee believed that there should be no reduction in the present scale of pay so far as these lower-priced stations are concerned, namely, the $300 stations; and there is an increase of estimates so as to provide for the present service upon the present basis of computation, and also to provide for additional service.

In the first item—that is, those of the higher class—I wish to be frank and say that if the present appropriation is carried it will necessarily result in the clerks of those stations being obliged to perform more work for the same compensation than they are receiving to-day.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If a postmaster sells stamps to the amount of $10,000 a year, he is entitled to free-delivery service in his town?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And to quite a salary himself—$2,000 a year, and a number of clerks in addition. Does the gentleman think it is entirely fair to say that where a person in charge of a substation sells more than $10,000 worth of stamps, issues more money orders than will be issued in several of the $10,000 towns, registers more letters than will be registered in several of the $10,000 towns, that he should not be paid more than $300 a year?

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree that there are a number of instances where the salaries of postmasters are $2,000 and more, where they have an assistant postmaster at a salary of $1,000 to $700, where they have an allowance for clerks in addition, and where the expense of the rental of quarters is provided—where the total expenses to the Government is $4,000 or $5,000—that do not perform any more work than a clerk in a number of these contract stations, who receive but a few hundred dollars. It is for that reason that the committee felt that it was advisable in the lower-grade stations to grant sufficient money so that there would be no curtailment in the salary, or rather no increase of duties for the same amount of compensation.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will pardon me, in the stations where they only do a small amount of business it is taken care of by the regular employees of the store; but there are many places in the city of Chicago where they employ extra clerks, sometimes one or two, to attend to this business. The result is that they either lose money or else they do not attend to the business as courteously and as properly as it should be done. Now, I can see no reason myself why we should expend $5,000 a year at a place where the sale of stamps would amount to $10,000, and then stick on spending $500 a year to pay in the city a man who sells the same amount of stamps and does other business in reference to money orders and registered letters—as much as would be done in a town.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee was confronted with the condition of the existing finances, and if that was not such a strong factor in the make-up of this bill, it would very likely have granted an additional appropriation to the estimate in the first item. We thought that the exigencies of the service demanded our increasing the estimate in the second item, because it is in those instances where the clerks perform a greater service and receive less compensation than in the higher-priced offices. It was for that reason that we did not increase the estimate in the first item.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall test the sense of the committee on the subject at any rate. I move to amend by inserting after the word "hundred," in line 7, the words "and twenty-five," so that it will read "$325,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 7, after "hundred," insert the words "and twenty-five," so as to read "$325,000."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to hear the gentleman now. He has not yet spoken on the subject.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the department does have a scale of pay for clerks in these contract stations, which has been changed from time to time. It is simply a regulation of the department. The department, as far as any testimony before the committee is concerned, has had no trouble in filling places in this service, but the appropriation in the second paragraph, which has been referred to, was increased because it was believed by the committee that it was advisable to increase these stations in the outskirts of the towns far from the main post-office, in sections where the people could not get at the post-office easily. There has been no difficulty, as far as we have had any evidence, in obtaining employees for this service.

Furthermore, the clerks' salaries depend on the registry and money-order business done and not on the number of stamps sold, because that amount could easily be increased abnormally; they do not do all of the work of these offices themselves, but very much of it is done at the main office. For instance, the First Assistant Postmaster-General states:

Please bear in mind, however, that these stations do not do all the work. A great deal of work in connection with the business of the stations is done at the main office, such as the keeping of the records, posting of money-order accounts, and all that sort of thing.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, instead of doing the work which would be done if this were a separate post-office, except the physical transaction of passing out the stamps and making returns to the auditor, the keeping of the books is done at the main office, and is another expense to the Post-Office Department. I hope this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think no one will claim that these stations do all of the work that is done at a country or a city post-office, as where they handle the mail, for instance, but they do a good deal more than the Assistant Postmaster-General would lead my distinguished friend to believe. They have to make a daily report of their post-office orders and they have to make a monthly report of their post-office orders. They have to make daily reports of other kinds and monthly reports of other kinds.

Mr. WEEKS. What other kinds?

Mr. MANN. In reference to the registry business.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, what?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I could bring to the gentleman a series of reports which the gentlemen are required to make, and I will give them to the gentleman afterwards. I am not expecting to affect the gentleman's judgment now. He is in charge of a bill which it is his business to defend, no matter what information he may receive on the floor, and I will undertake to flood the gentleman with a lot of these reports and statements which these gentlemen in charge of these substations are required to make. They make my headache to look at them.

Mr. FASSETT. Then there must be a lot of them.

Mr. MANN. There are a lot of them. It is surprising to see what they are required to do.

Now, the proposition only is whether you should increase this $300,000 $25,000 in order to permit the department, under such regulations as it has or may make, to properly increase the compensation to those offices which largely increase their business. Under this appropriation an office which to-day starts in at $100, or, say, $300, if it increases its sales of stamps from $5,000 to $20,000, or its money-order and registry transactions many fold, there is no chance to increase it unless you decrease somebody else, and it does not seem to me that it is a fair thing, even in the opinion of my distinguished and beloved friend from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MANN), there were—ayes 14, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For separating mails at third and fourth class post-offices, $700,000: Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster-General may allow to fourth-class postmasters additional compensation for separating services and for unusual conditions during a portion of the year, in lieu of the allowance for clerical services for this purpose now authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the committee in inserting that proviso which has just been read is that in many third and fourth class offices the postmaster, either personally or through clerks, is obliged to do a large amount of separating business for star routes and rural routes, work that does not belong to his office.

In these offices, of the fourth-class offices especially, the postmaster has no authority to spend any money for clerks, but he has time enough frequently to do the work himself, and it is the purpose of this provision to enable the postmaster to do that work himself, make a return to that effect, and receive the additional pay to which his labor entitles him. If, on the other hand, he did not have the privilege which this proviso would give him, and any work of that sort were done, even if he did the work himself, he would have to make a return that it was done by a clerk, and the money would have to be paid to someone else than himself. It does not increase the appropriation. It enables the money to be paid to the man who does the work rather than to somebody whom he employed for that purpose, even when the postmaster himself has plenty of time to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This proviso does not limit the additional compensation to the man who might be paid for extra help?

Mr. WEEKS. It limits the total appropriation. If the gentleman will notice, it says, "For separating mails at third and fourth class post-offices, $700,000."

Mr. MANN. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman in reference to this item which I think he did not state? There have been a number of bills presented lately and several passed in the Senate which I think are pending before the Committee on Claims in the House——

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is different from what the gentleman has in mind——

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; this is in reference to appointment of clerks and carriers at a higher salary than provided by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; this is at the bottom of page 12.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was the other item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it was intended that the additional compensation that might be given to a postmaster should not exceed the amount that might be allowed him for extra clerks?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not understand so. It was intended that the money should be paid to the postmaster instead of paid to the clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chairman will permit, I will say in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York that this limitation embodies two separate provisions. It provides an allowance to postmasters at fourth-class offices for separating services in lieu of the present law that limits that compensation only when he employs clerical assistance to perform this work, and, secondly, and that is the question which the gentleman wishes information upon, it provides an allowance for unusual conditions during a portion of the year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. I will repeat the question——

Mr. STAFFORD. I may not have grasped the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is very plain. Is it the intention to limit the additional compensation that the postmaster can receive to the amount which could be allowed him if he had employed a clerk?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nothing in here to limit it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say in reply that there is no provision under the law for clerical services to fourth-class postmasters. We provide for clerical services to postmasters in presidential grades—the first, second, and third class—but in fourth-class offices we make no provision whatever.

Now, there was this provision that was called to the attention of the committee, that in summer resorts, notably in the case called to our attention by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], in whose district is Mackinac, where there is a very heavy business during three months of the year, and which, if continued throughout the year, would bring it into the presidential class. Still there is no provision made by law whereby the Post-Office Department can award that postmaster an allowance for clerical service that is really needed during that period. Here is the provision that permits some allowance for clerical services during the period.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a provision of law which authorizes the allowance for clerical services in fourth-class offices for separating the mails?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is, but the postmaster must certify to the department when he receives it that the service was performed with clerical assistance. But there are numerous instances where the postmaster does not need the services of a clerk to do this separation. It was an inducement to fraud to make a certification that he had employed some clerk, and the committee believe that when the postmaster performs the work himself, he should be allowed the amount without the intervention of any clerk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What limitation is there placed upon the amount which may be allowed to the postmaster under those circumstances?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The words "in lieu of."

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not a limitation on the amount. The proviso says he may be allowed additional compensation for separating services.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no limitation whatsoever, except a limitation as provided by the regulations of the Post-Office Department, based upon the number of pieces of mail separated. It is a matter purely of regulation, where the amount is determined by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For unusual conditions at post-offices, $125,000: Provided, That the expenditure of so much thereof as may be found necessary to carry out the provisions hereinafter set forth, but in no case exceeding in the aggregate $15,000, is limited as follows:

Whenever a postmaster in any locality with a population of not more than 20,000 inhabitants certifies to the department that, owing to unusual conditions in his community, he is unable to secure the services of efficient employees otherwise, the Postmaster-General may authorize, in his discretion, the appointment of clerks and letter carriers for that office at such higher rates of compensation, within the present recognized grades, as may be necessary in order to insure a proper conduct of the postal business.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 13, line 4, by striking out the words "in no case exceeding," and insert the word "not;" and in line 5, after the word "aggregate," by inserting the words "to exceed."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Clerk kindly report the amendment again?

Mr. MANN. Let it be read the way it would be as amended.

Mr. FINLEY. By permission of the Chair, I will read it as it would be as amended:

Provided, That the expenditure of so much thereof as may be found necessary to carry out the provisions hereinafter set forth, not in the aggregate to exceed $15,000, is limited as follows.

Mr. Chairman, my reason for offering that is that I am apprehensive of the language employed, particularly the words "in no case exceeding" might be held to apply to a single post-office, and the purpose of the committee was to limit this appropriation to all cases coming under this head.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] desire to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WANGER. No, sir. I thought the amendment had been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 13, by inserting in line 10, after the word "Postmaster-General," the following: "having ascertained the truth of the certification."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to have that amendment read again, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance to third-class post-offices to cover the cost of clerical services in offices where the salaries of the postmasters range from $1,000 to $1,500, $580,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $200 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $300 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend as follows: Beginning with the word "in," in line 19, page 13, strike out all to and including the word "nor," in line 22, page 13, and insert the words "shall be made," after the word "dollars," in line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I raise the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MANN. With that out, there is no limitation upon the amount that may be allowed—salaries of $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I strike that out.

Mr. MANN. You strike out the limitation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the gentleman's attention to the phraseology in the main body of the paragraph, which grants an allowance to postmasters where their salaries range from $1,000 to $1,500. If you strike out the limitation entirely as to the offices where the postmaster's salary is $1,000 to $1,200, you permit the department to pay any amount for clerical allowance. Here we have a limitation that it will not exceed $200.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I see the point, and I ask leave to withdraw that amendment and offer another.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman: Insert the word "one" where the word "two" is found in line 19, page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend so as to read that "no amount in excess of $100 shall be made."

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then I desire to offer another amendment, and to make it now: Insert "two" for the word "three" in line 22, page 13.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22 insert the word "two" instead of the word "three," so as to read "two hundred."

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, this item carries $508,000, and on the top of page 14 is another item of $750,000. The total amount carried by these two items is $1,330,000 to pay clerk hire in third-class post-offices. I do not believe that it is needed at all. If I believed for one moment that it would hurt the efficiency of the postal service to offer this amendment, I would not make it, but my experience and observation has been that third-class postmasters ordinarily are newspaper men, locally speaking; maybe a few of them are lawyers and a few doctors. My experience is that the postmaster goes ahead and attends to his business. The family ordinarily takes care of the post-office. I believe that if the postmaster will devote the proper degree of attention to the office that the public has a right to ask him to devote to it that the office would be carefully and properly handled and the Government saved many hundreds of thousands of dollars each year. The salary of the postmaster of a third-class office is fixed by the receipts of the post-office. If I recollect the provision of the statute correctly, where the receipts aggregate between $1,900 and $2,100, the salary is $1,000; between $2,200 and $2,400, the salary is $1,100; and between $2,400 and $2,800, the salary is $1,200.

I undertake to say that no business man in the United States conducting a business where the sum total of that business each year does not exceed $1,900 or $2,100 would hire clerks. He could not afford to hire clerks. One of the troubles of the Post-Office Department is that it is top-heavy with employees. The very idea that 325,000 people in some way or some manner are connected with the postal affairs of this country is an absurdity; and the total amount of business done by the post-office in the way of receipts and disbursements does not equal $240,000,000.

Instead of undertaking to wipe out the deficit by practicing rigid economy, it looks to me very much as though there is an attempt made to increase the deficit by taking money out of the Treasury and paying it to employees who are not needed for the efficiency of the service. I know postmasters in my district who, while they are very good men, yet I undertake to say they do not spend one-fifth of their time in the post-office. They are following some other avocation or occupation and their families take care of the post-office.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would you say in case they do give all their time and attention to the business of the post-office?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is just what they ought to do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would you say then about their compensation?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would say they would come near earning it, if they give their entire time and attention to their official duties.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that the third-class postmasters in this country are more poorly paid than the first and second class postmasters?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Oh, no; I do not agree with the gentleman at all. I imagine the gentleman has no trouble in finding a number of men for every post-office in his district.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just the same as with Members of Congress. There is no trouble in finding men who are willing to serve as Members of Congress.

Mr. COX of Indiana. We have no voice in the selection of postmasters, as far as we are concerned, upon this side.

Mr. WANGER. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Post-Office Department in passing upon applications for allowances for clerk hire in third-class offices requires a showing by the postmaster of the time which he personally gives to the administration and conduct of the office, and the extent to which he requires clerical assistance?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not know; but I understand the law to be this upon that point——

Mr. WANGER. I have been assured that that is the fact.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I understand the law to be that when the receipts from a third-class office reach a certain amount, then the postmaster is entitled to certain clerk hire. I may be in error about that, but I think that is the fact.

Mr. WANGER. The Postmaster-General has repeatedly declared that the department requires a showing of the time given by the postmaster and of the necessary expenditure by him for clerk hire before making any allowance to any of these officers.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, without repeating what I said a while ago, this is a useless expenditure of money, and I do not believe it can be properly defended upon any ground of economy whatever. I recollect that the statement appeared in the newspapers the other day that a very prominent gentleman at the other end of this Capitol proclaimed to this country that he could run this Government for $300,000,000 a year less than it was being run now.

Mr. FINLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman, is it not a matter of common belief that that gentleman is running the country now to a very large extent?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to refer to what takes place in the Senate.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I did not use anyone's name.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference.

Mr. COX of Indiana. In reply to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] I will say that I do not know. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that what I have suggested here can be done without crippling the service in any way, and I believe it is incumbent on this side of the House that we begin to practice economy in line with the suggestion that has been made elsewhere.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman, in accordance with his belief in the matter, move to strike out the item?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not want to be too harsh, to start with. If the gentleman will make that motion I will readily follow him.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not on the committee. The gentleman is on the committee and has superior information, and I am yielding to his judgment in the matter. The gentleman says the allowance is unnecessary, and moves to cut it from $200 to $100. If it is unnecessary, I would cut it out entirely. If it is necessary, I would leave it to the department to judge whether it should be $200 or $100.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I reserved the right to offer an amendment on this paragraph when I was in the committee.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticising the gentleman, but if this appropriation is not necessary, then why not move to strike it out entirely, instead of moving to reduce the amount that may be allowed at an office?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Probably the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois would be appropriate; but I do not desire to be too harsh upon this proposition. Whether this amendment passes or not, I hope that gentleman will begin to practice economy along these lines and see if we can not get this institution upon a fair economical basis.

Mr. WANGER. Would not the suggestion of the gentleman be met by an amendment providing that no allowance should be made, except where the postmaster devotes at least seven hours' personal service to the conduct of the office?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think it would, and if the gentleman will offer such an amendment I will gladly support it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments be limited to fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be concluded in fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I want to ask where is the close of this paragraph?

Mr. MANN. At the bottom of page 13.

Mr. REEDER. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken when he says that third-class postmasters perform little or no service in the conduct of the offices in their charge. It may be true in the gentleman's district; I have nothing to say about that. It is not true that newspaper men generally are postmasters. That may be true in the gentleman's district; but it does not prevail throughout the country. In the congressional district I represent, out of 150 postmasters there is not a single newspaper man in the whole lot. There is not a lawyer that I remember of, and there is not a doctor. They are individuals generally selected for their fitness.

Now, you can cut out all of this allowance for clerical assistance in third-class post-offices, but you must bear in mind that when you do it you do so at the expense of the efficiency of the service in third-class post-offices. This matter was all thrashed out years ago and was settled, as I thought, for all time, unless the time should come when the patrons of the third-class post-offices in this country demanded better service than they now have, and when that time comes it will be necessary to raise the allowance for clerical assistance.

It is true that third-class postmasters can not remain in the post-office the whole time the office is required to be open and give to the public that service to which it is entitled. There are many third-class post-offices where the salary is not more than $1,000, where the office is hard to fill because the labor is excessive, because conditions exist there that require the services of more than one person. This is not a new question. Congress years ago took up the question dealing with the third-class post-offices and giving the patrons of these offices—not to the postmaster, but giving to the patrons—better and more efficient service, the service they are entitled to. Now, to strike out the allowance for clerical assistance in the third-class post-offices is reducing it below the efficiency that the public is entitled to.

Now, it is true the amounts are paid in full in very rare instances. The amount appropriated here does not begin to pay anything like $200, $300, $400, or $500, so that if the gentleman will investigate the matter he will find that in very few instances is the maximum allowance paid. In the congressional district I represent out of seven third-class offices there is only one third-class office that receives the maximum allowance, and that is on account of unusual conditions. So I hope that the gentleman's motion will be voted down, and it ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to have both amendments voted on together?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then both amendments will be considered together.

The question was taken; and the amendments were rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the last paragraph on page 13 and the first paragraph on page 14 is existing law?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental and purchase of canceling machines, including cost of power in rented buildings, motors, repairs to motors, and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation, $310,000, $35,000 of which sum may be expended in the purchase of such machines, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the rental of canceling machines to cover a period not exceeding three years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee about how many machines the Government rents and what is the average price?

Mr. WEEKS. The number under contract at the present time is 240 at a rental of $400, 94 at a rental of $150, 190 at a rental of $90; those are owned by one company. The American Postal Machine Company, of Boston, has 439 at $150 each, 277 at $100 each, 341 at $80 each, 9 at $60 each, 23 at $250 each; the Time Marking Machine Company, Chicago, 53 at $300 each; the Columbia Postal Supply Company, 65 at $150 each; the Universal Stamp Machine Company, New York, 25 at $150 each. The annual rate of expenditure December 8, 1909, for all machines, was $279,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would ask in that same connection if the Postmaster-General is permitted to make these contracts direct, or is it done by advertising for bids?

Mr. WEEKS. I take it the same method is followed as in making other contracts—by bids.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask in that same connection—for I do not know anything about it—would it not be cheaper for the Government to purchase these machines and own them outright?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty has been in the past that one of these companies did not wish to sell its machines. One company, the first one to which I referred, does not now care to sell its machines, but the other four companies are willing to, especially the American Machine Company, of Boston, which has recently sold some machines to the Government. Last year there was $2,000 surplus from the appropriation, and 10 machines were bought at $200 apiece. Those were machines that were rented at an annual rental of $60 apiece, and the proviso in this paragraph is for the purpose of enabling the Government to buy machines and test out whether it is cheaper to buy them or rent them. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] will notice that we have provided that longer contracts than for one year may be made, the theory being that if longer contracts are made we will obtain a lower price. I am sure that we can save 10 per cent, and possibly 12 per cent. If we do save 11 per cent, it would provide $35,000 to purchase the machines. Now, the Government owns about 300 machines, known as the "Doremus." They were bought a good many years ago, some of them as long as ten years ago. They have been in operation since, and some of them have gone to pieces. If the cost of maintaining the machine is not too large, there is no doubt about the advisability of the Government buying the machines, and it is for this purpose that we have provided for a longer contract, to determine whether it is wise to adopt that policy or to continue to rent or lease.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Where contracts are made like that, who keeps the machines in order?

Mr. WEEKS. The companies do in all cases.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the next paragraph, what other labor-saving devices are there that the Government rents besides these canceling machines?

Mr. WEEKS. The Government is trying to develop labor-saving devices to be used in large post-offices. There is in the Chicago post-office a very complicated system of carrying belts for handling mail and carrying it from one part of the post-office to the other. In the Hudson Terminal, in New York, where a branch post-office has recently been established, a distributing arrangement was installed, at a cost of not more than $9,000, which enabled the department to dispense with the services of 10 laborers employed in that branch post-office. That is simply a sample of what they are trying to do by installing labor-saving devices.

Mr. SULLOWAY. They are all protected by patents?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the point of order has been withdrawn?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. There is no point of order made against the amendment, because it has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that a point of order is made against the paragraph.

Mr. WEEKS. The point of order was reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of line 4, page 15, after the word "dollars;" also strike out lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 and insert in lieu thereof "and no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used for the payment of rental of canceling machines under new contracts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have not withdrawn my point of order as to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair was trying to find out.

Mr. MANN. I thought the amendment was to be read for information.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve a point of order on the amendment which has just been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN].

The CHAIRMAN. No amendments are in order until the point of order to the paragraph has been determined. The gentleman from Illinois has reserved the point of order as to the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and the Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the time has come when we ought to do away with this unbusinesslike method of renting anything that is used in the departments.

I referred to this matter about two years ago, but no change has been made. We are still at the mercy of these companies that charge us exorbitant rates for the renting of these canceling machines. The fact is, that there has been spent since 1904, when we first commenced using these canceling machines, in the neighborhood of $2,000,000, which is four to five times the amount for which the machines could have been bought. There were rented last year 1,540 machines at an annual rental of about $257,000, running from $80 up to $400 per machine, and it seems to me that the companies that have got all of this money have not treated us right. There is, for instance, the Combination machine, of which in 1904 we used 64 and are using 390 to-day, and still their rental price remains the same—$150 per year. Perhaps we ought to be thankful to those people for not raising their prices, when they had us at their mercy and could do just as they pleased. Now, some may say, we can not buy the machines because the companies do not want to sell. There are similar machines used in Europe that can be purchased for about $500 to $600, working as well as machines for which we pay $400 a year rental. I also understand that the original inventor of the canceling machine now in use in this country, and who lives in Ohio, has a machine that works well which he is ready to sell to us at $400 each; and if that is the case, it is unbusinesslike for us to continue to pay these postal-supply companies such exorbitant prices for rent. I therefore sincerely hope that my amendment will prevail.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the cost price of these machines to manufacture?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. That is impossible to state, as they do not quote the price. They are well satisfied if we continue to pay these exorbitant rentals, and they do not want to name a sale price to us.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is the rental price about the value of the original cost of the machine?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Just about, as far as I can ascertain.

Mr. AUSTIN. They pay for the cost every year in rent?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Yes. We are doing that on canceling machines. We are also paying an exorbitant rent for mail cars. Why, we are paying five, six, and seven thousand dollars yearly rental for each mail car, while you can purchase one outright, fully equipped, for only $15,000, and I tell you if you want to reduce our postal deficit it is about time to change these methods of doing business and thereby save several millions of dollars yearly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin is certainly mistaken when he says that the cost of one of these canceling machines is only about what the annual rental is. This subject has been repeatedly investigated and there is no question but there is only one very high grade, very rapid canceling machine, and that is the Hey-Dolphin Flyer, for which a rental of $400 per annum is paid. That is the only machine which appears to be capable of performing such a vast number of cancellations in the briefest period of time. Now, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department investigated this subject to some extent about a year ago, and any Member who is desirous of observing what its conclusions were can doubtless obtain a copy of the report which it made to the House. The Hey-Dolphin Flyer can be obtained from no party except the manufacturers. It is not used by some countries which have very thorough, up-to-date postal administration. For example, the German Government does not use that canceling machine at all, and yet the celerity of mail delivery in the great German cities is perhaps as great as it is in any city in this country.

The committee appointed by the Postmaster-General some three years ago examined into this subject and made a report to the Postmaster-General, which was transmitted to Congress, and in their report they reached a tentative conclusion, because they claimed that further investigation and information was necessary, that the life of a canceling machine was only about three years, and that therefore a very high price for rental had to be received by the manufacturers, as compared with the life of the machine. Now, as I recall the fact, the canceling machine used in Germany costs only about $550 for a machine. They have had them for about four years. There is apparently no marked depreciation in the value or efficiency of the machine, and there is very little annual expense for repairs, and it does seem as if this great expedition, which is practicable by the use of the Hey-Dolphin Flyer, is really not essential, and it might be very great economy to adopt certain of the other machines, some of which are now used, and one kind of which, at least, might be obtained by the department.

The machine which was recommended by the gentleman from Wisconsin does not begin to compare in efficiency with other machines which are rented by the department, not even by those which are rented for a much less price than $400 per annum. While I believe that economy is possible in this matter, I yet doubt the wisdom of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN].

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, what is the reason the Government does not buy these machines?

Mr. WANGER. The Hey-Dolphin Flyer is made under a patent, and it is optional with the manufacturers whether they dispose of their machines or not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will they not sell them?

Mr. WANGER. They will not sell them, and the information that they gave three or more years ago to the department was that they were getting higher rentals from some other governments or parties that use them than they get from the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is as bad as this shoe-machinery combine.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of California. I would like to say a word in reply to what was said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] and what has been emphasized by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. We have in this country what is known as the "patent-right law," which does more to wrap bands about our hands and feet and every part of the body and deliver us over to more trusts and monopolies than any law in the statutes. I have discussed this matter privately with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN]. He knows that I have a bill pending before the committee of which he is a member, the Patent Committee, which would entirely cure this matter. If he will be so kind as to have that bill reported we may untie our hands, and we will put everybody who invents a machine or an appliance of any kind on the open market, where anybody can manufacture the invention who wants to pay a reasonable royalty to the inventor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question or two. I used to serve on that Patent Committee, and I am very much interested in the matter. How are you going to fix a reasonable royalty? Who is going to fix it?

Mr. SMITH of California. The bill I have introduced provides that the patentee may file with the Commissioner of Patents a statement of the royalty, and then anybody may manufacture it who wants to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is about what these fellows are doing, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of California. No. These fellows have the exclusive right of manufacture, and will not sell, and that is the case with thousands of pieces of machinery in this country. There is not anything in this country, in my opinion, which does so much to raise the prices on the common necessaries of life and extorts as much money from the pockets of the people as the patent-right laws in their present condition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am sort of coming to that conclusion myself, and have been for some time, but I do not see how the suggestion of yours would remedy the situation. Under that the patentee could fix the royalty so high that nobody could provide these machines.

Mr. SMITH of California. That would be true, and it would have that effect, if he were engaged in the manufacturing business. But if you insert the words "reasonable royalty" you will have a case similar to "a reasonable rate" in transportation, and so forth.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I received a letter from a man out in Wichita, Kans., that inclosed an elaborate article on the idea that patents are what make the prices so high, and his remedy was for the United States Government to fix the price at which they were to be sold, which seemed to me to be absolutely visionary.

Mr. SMITH of California. It seems to me that if you insert the words "reasonable royalty," then the courts could determine whether a royalty was reasonable, based upon the use, the selling price, and the general nature of the invention.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How would it do to scale the seventeen-year term down to seven or eight years?

Mr. SMITH of California. That may be important. I am not certain. Of course we have got to hold to the idea that an inventor must be well rewarded, in order to stimulate genius. But I do think that we are perpetrating the most monumental folly in the world when we say to a man who discovers a useful instrument or implement that he may have an absolute monopoly, and that he may fix the price and refuse to do business with a man who undertakes to sell below the price which he names.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It may be news to the gentleman from California that the Committee on Patents came as near as pease six or eight years ago entering upon a policy that would have extended every patent in the United States ultimately by one-half of the seventeen-year period. We had a battle royal for four years, and finally settled the policy that they should not be extended.

Mr. SMITH of California. The evil runs through every class of farm machines and domestic appliances. A man may invent a machine which is almost necessary for the manufacture of a shoe, and he may give the right to use that very valuable instrument to one factory, and thereby put every other factory at a great disadvantage.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that nobody can run a shoe factory in the United States profitably at this time without paying tribute to the combination of the manufacturers of machines that manufacture shoes?

Mr. SMITH of California. I am not acquainted with the details; but I have heard it suggested that there are one or two machines entirely necessary for the manufacture of shoes by present-day methods, and, of course, somebody has a monopoly on those machines. I think it was true when Bessemer invented the method of making steel which bears his name. He was permitted or able to place the entire steel industry of the world at his mercy. He could give out franchises or permits to one concern to use that method and deprive all the rest of the world of the advantage. It is a very great wrong, which should be corrected.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say that whatever improvements we can make in our patent laws I am very much in favor of. I have already started the ball rolling, and have got through the Patent Committee a most important improvement, and shall continue to try for further changes until we have the best patent laws in the world, instead of, as we have to-day, the poorest. [Applause.]

In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I wish to say that two years ago there was an exhibition in the Washington post-office of a machine, I believe from Great Britain, which is offered for sale at between $500 and $600, which, according to the officials, worked well. If that is true, there is no reason why we should pay $400 a year rent for a similar machine.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman state the number of transactions per minute of that machine, whereby we may get at what it would be able to accomplish?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. I did not stay long enough at the test to look into all the details, but the general facts, as I have stated them, are correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is an important matter for us to determine whether it is a similar machine, to ascertain the number of pieces it will cancel, and whether it is capable of performing the same amount of work. The gentleman is making a very broad statement in saying that it is a similar machine. Now, we have any number of different character of machines employed in the service. Some of them we are able to purchase, but they are not capable of performing the high character of efficiency which is required of these Hey-Dolphin machines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded in seven minutes.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I must object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of calling to the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin the fact that I do not think the amendment he has offered will effect the purpose that he intends it to accomplish. On reading the hearings which were had before the Post-Office Committee I find that Doctor Grandfield, testifying before the committee, stated that one of the reasons why the Post-Office Department had not been able to free itself from the clutches of these different concerns with whom it was doing business was the fact that they were not authorized to contract for more than one year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman point out to the committee the phraseology in existing law whereby the department is limited in its purchases? It contains no limitation on the total appropriation which can be used for the purchase of machines.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. If the gentleman will listen, Mr. Chairman, he will find that I am in favor of the proposition that he is in favor of, and that I have not made any statement contrary to what he contends.

I am simply calling the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that his amendment strikes out this language which the committee has brought in here, and which enables the Post-Office Department to contract for a longer period than one year. So that the estimable gentleman from Wisconsin, whom we all love and revere, is, unintentionally, I am sure, playing into the hands of these horrific monopolists, whom he is so constantly, earnestly, and sincerely denouncing on the floor; and I am satisfied that when his attention is called to the effect of that part of his amendment he is going to modify it so as to leave it in the power of the Post-Office Department to contract for more than one year, so far as the rental of these machines is concerned, with the result that they can then advertise and receive proposals from all concerns, including the German concern, and award the contract to the lowest and best bidder.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KÜSTERMANN) there were—ayes 48, noes 63.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "years," on page 15, line 8, insert the following: "Provided, That the rental paid for any canceling machine shall not exceed $300 per annum, including repairs on said machine."

Mr. WEEKS. I reserve a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I do not believe that the point of order would lie against this amendment for the reason that this is simply a limitation upon the amount of money which can be paid for the rental of these machines. We are now paying as high as $400 per year for these canceling machines, and I am reliably informed that they cost about that much money.

Mr. WEEKS. Where does the gentleman get his information about the cost of the machines?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. From the Assistant Postmaster-General, who informs me that he thinks they could not be bought for a thousand dollars, but that they cost very much less.

Mr. WEEKS. He did not say how much less?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. No; but he said very much less. We are renting from the Time Marking Machine Company, of the city of Chicago, canceling machines for $300 per year, and that company keeps those machines in repair and also furnishes the motor; and those machines, as stated by the Assistant Postmaster-General, will cancel as many as 450 letters per minute.

Mr. WANGER. My recollection is that the Hey-Dolphin Flyer cancels from 40,000 to 60,000 letters per hour, and cancels the stamp wherever it may be on the envelope.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I think the gentleman is incorrect in his recollection of the number. I think 450 letters a minute is about as fast as any of them go. It seems to me it is folly for this House to pass an appropriation bill here that pays to these firms nearly the cost of the machine each year. I suggest to the Post-Office Committee that if they really want to practice economy, here is an opportunity, where you can save at least $100 per year upon each of these canceling machines. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but this machine company in the city of Chicago are willing to rent these machines to the Government, furnish the motors, and keep the machines in repair, and at the end of five years they will give the machines to the Government. Do you want this sort of a provision in the bill for the sake of economy? If you do, here is the opportunity to get it. [Applause.] If you want to go on and make a present of $100 per year on each machine to these firms who hold a monopoly and refuse to sell their machines to the Government, and to allow the Government to pay $400 rental and to furnish the motors, then defeat this amendment or make a point of order against it, and you can present these gentlemen with this extra amount of money.

We pay now from $60 to $90 per year rental for the hand machines that we have in the little post-offices, in the smaller towns like those which the most of us live in. It is shown by the Assistant Postmaster-General that these machines can be purchased for $200. This amendment does not affect them. There are some advantages in the use of these "International Flyers," as has been suggested here by members of this committee; but I want to say that there are advantages, too, in the machine that is made by the firm in Chicago, Ill. There are labor-saving devices connected with that machine that are not connected with the machine manufactured in New York or Boston.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the course of the gentleman's remarks I infer that he has consulted the First Assistant Postmaster-General about that canceling machine. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether he asked the Postmaster-General why it was that the department had not adopted more of the time-marking machines made in Chicago?

I ask that for the reason that there is nothing in the hearings that covers that point. Several years ago, when the machine that the gentleman refers to was first put on the market, the representation was made to us that it was not in condition to rent any great number, and that it was not equal to the Hey-Dolphin. I know that the committee would be glad to get the information if the gentleman has it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. It is a fact that the Assistant Postmaster-General has not been able to get all the machines he desired from the Time Marking Machine Company in the city of Chicago, for the reason that they have not yet been able to manufacture a sufficient number of them to supply the Government. Now, it is shown that the time has come to put a limitation in this bill; and if you will do it, they will be able to manufacture in a short time enough to take the place of these machines manufactured by companies that refuse, if they do as they have in the past, to rent their machines to the Government except at an excessive price.

[The time of Mr. FOSTER of Illinois having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended five minutes.]

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the gentleman, the department has been willing to accept more of these time-marking machines, of which there were only 53 in use on December 8 last. Will the gentleman explain why it is that they can not furnish more when the department is in an acceptable frame of mind?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman that I believe they are now manufacturing these machines as fast as the Government will take them. Another thing: The gentleman must remember that possibly these machines, or some of them, that have been perfected have only been on the market a short time, but the time has come when it is no longer necessary to pay attention to the machines that have been rented to the Government at these excessive prices, and that the time is now here when we can stop this excessive rental being paid for these machines.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that the department has accepted all the machines from the Time Marking Machine Company, of Chicago, that they could manufacture and deliver to the Post-Office Department; that there has been a limit on the capitalization of the company that prevents the manufacture of any more, so that if there is any fault on the part of anybody, it is on this company itself?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I do not know anything in the hearings that shows where the Assistant Postmaster-General says that he could not secure enough machines from the Chicago firm at this time. He did say that the company had offered to rent for a period, and at the end of five years they would give them to the Government; and these machines will last from eight to twenty years.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not direct the gentleman's attention to anything in this year's hearings, but several years ago in the hearings the Assistant Postmaster-General stated that this machine was not equal to the Hey-Dolphin machine, and that the company was not adapted to furnish him a sufficient number.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will say that that might have been true in the past, but I do not believe it is true now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Upon what does the gentleman base his assertion that it is not true at the present time?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Although they were not able to supply them in the past, they have now enlarged the plant and perfected the machines until they are able to supply them when they get the opportunity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state the capacity of the factory?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. No; I do not know. I want to say that these same machines that he is standing up for now is the same company which a few years ago held up this Government and refused to let the Government have the machines when they were making a large profit on the machines.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to take exception to the remarks of the gentleman, because I have been standing up for the Chicago machine. In fact, when it was first introduced upon the market, as the hearings will disclose, I asked the Postmaster-General why he did not enter into a contract with the Chicago company and reserve the right to purchase them. I have always been in favor of purchasing the canceling machines of that company.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and I am glad to know that he is in favor of that machine, and I hope the gentleman will vote for this proposition.

[The time of Mr. FOSTER of Illinois having again expired, his time was extended two minutes.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a simple proposition to this House, it seems to me; that is, if it desires to save $100 a year upon each machine, it has an opportunity to do so. If it desires to present these companies over in New York and some other cities with that amount of money, these companies that desire to hold up the Government for an extra $100 a year on each machine, then vote down this amendment and you can do it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much on all of them?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. There are 240 machines that we are now paying $400 per year for, and this would cut it down to $300 per year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Twenty-four thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes; and more than that, we are paying for the motors, which amount to about $20 per year, as I understand it, for these $400 machines, and with these $300 machines that we rent from this firm in Chicago they furnish the motor themselves, and the Government pays that much less. Now, this is the proposition, as I understand it, and if we will put this limitation on this appropriation we can then come in and say to these firms, "Here is $300 per year, and if you do not want to accept that we will rent these machines from the firms that give them to us at $300 per year." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the Members of this House are not very much interested whether a New York machine or a Boston machine or a Chicago machine is used for canceling purposes by the Government. I am sorry to hear any question about whether this machine or that machine should be appropriated for, because it has nothing to do with the case. The facts are that until within a couple of years there have been only two machines for this purpose—the Hey-Dolphin Flyer, or the company which manufactures that machine, which also manufactures machines of other sizes, and the American Company, of Boston. Within the last two years three other companies have commenced to manufacture machines of new types. The Chicago company, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] refers, had a contract with the Government last year, but was unable to furnish the machines. In the hearings last year the First Assistant Postmaster-General is asked this question:

> You furnished us a list last year of the machines in use. Have you added any of the different makes of machines since that time?
> Yes; we have. We had a machine called a "Chicago machine," made in Chicago. We had a contract last year, but we had no machines in service at that time, the manufacturer not having completed any of the machines.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, this is a new machine. The Government has been endeavoring to encourage the building of new machines. It has urged those who were trying to develop new machines to do so, so that there might be more competition. Gentlemen have said that we ought to purchase these machines instead of renting them, that we are paying too high a rental. I am inclined to think that that may be true.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to a statement of Mr. Grandfield, found at the bottom of page 98 of the hearings.

Mr. WEEKS. I read from the hearings of last year.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes, I understand; and I want to call to the attention of the chairman what Mr. Grandfield says this year. He says:

> Since then another company has made an offer of this kind: To rent the machines for five years, making a contract for five years at a certain stipulated price, with the understanding that at the expiration of the five years the machines should become the property of the department. The Postmaster-General has recommended that the department be given authority to make contracts for rental of machines for a term of five years, and we have prepared letters to the canceling-machine companies asking for propositions along those lines.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, under the law, as the comptroller has construed it, the department has not had heretofore the power to make contracts for rentals of machines for a longer period than one year. It is believed that if that period is extended, as is provided in the proviso, machines can be rented at a lower annual rental. That is one purpose in putting the proviso in the bill. We believe we can save of this $310,000, $35,000, which may be applied to the purchase of machines. The Government does not know how much it is going to cost to maintain these machines, because every company furnishing them provides spare parts and keeps the machine in working condition, so that all expense of that character is taken off the hands of the Government.

If the Government has to maintain its own machines it may find it very expensive, and we ought to experiment to find out whether the Government can buy these machines and maintain them, so that the net cost will be less than renting them. We own 300 small machines now, and we maintain a small repair shop in Washington, employing one clerk and two or three men in the repair shop. I maintain that no radical change should be made in any system connected with the government service until we have sufficient facts to warrant making the change. If this authority is given and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is voted down we will be able to purchase during the next year, in addition to maintaining this service at the present standard, $35,000 worth of machines. If we buy the $200 machine, which is the kind that was purchased last year, it would enable us to buy 175 machines without adding to our appropriation. Therefore I say that the Government is justified in commencing that experiment in a businesslike way, instead of making a jump without knowing the facts. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, is a point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has been made.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon the amendment. I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois should carry, and that it should be made a part of this bill. I do not subscribe at all to the doctrine that it is the duty of this House simply to be hung up by the heels by some manufacturing concern by reason of a patent law and for us to say that because of certain patent laws we ought to continue to pay $400 a year rent for certain canceling machines. This House has had a similar experience during the last two years.

I recollect, either last session or the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, that there was a limitation put upon the naval bill fixing the amount that the Government should pay for its powder, and up until that time the Government had been paying a great deal more for its powder than was fixed in the limitation in that bill, yet it was argued at that time that the powder could not possibly be furnished to the Navy Department within the limitation as fixed upon by the bill, but I have heard no complaint whatever but plenty of powder has been furnished, and furnished within that limitation. Now, here we are met with a provision that we can not do better than this and that we have to pay this enormous and exorbitant rental of $400 a year upon certain canceling machines. I undertake to say, and give it as my candid judgment, that if the limitation obtains, as offered by the gentleman from the State of Illinois, we will get just as many canceling machines as we need. At any rate, in my judgment, it is worth the experiment to see whether or not we can not fix a limitation and say to the people furnishing these machines, We will let you have a rental of so much and not above that amount. I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will obtain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, there was a point of order reserved on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a point of order reserved on the amendment——

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. And I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is too late——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New Jersey to make the point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I wish to point out to the Chair the statute requiring the cancellation of letters.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I submit this, just a moment, that the gentleman who reserved the point of order was the gentleman who called for a vote upon this amendment, and that was the chairman of the committee, Mr. WEEKS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I understood the point of order was reserved for the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is right about it.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. May I have the proposed amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The point of order is, Mr. Chairman, that this section rests upon a statute requiring a duty of the Postmaster-General, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not a limitation upon an appropriation, but it is a proposition to change the organic law in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the statute to which the gentleman from New Jersey refers authorize the Postmaster-General to make a contract for three years?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The statute requires the Postmaster-General to perform a duty; that is the requirement of the statute. In pursuance to that appropriations have been made to furnish him with machines to fulfill that duty. The proposition now to be added to the organic law, that in no case shall any amount of money of the given sum be paid for rental machines, is not a limitation on an appropriation bill, but it applies to the organic statute.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has asked the gentleman from New Jersey whether the existing law authorizes the Postmaster-General to enter into contract for the rental of canceling machines to cover a period of not exceeding three years.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. It permits him to do whatever he has authority to do under the general statute; and if this amendment had effect, it is to limit the discretion which he gets by the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. Does not the Government put into its different contracts the right to terminate them whenever it gets ready?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do not know what is in the contracts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but is not that the universal practice? Is not that the law?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I am not informed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, it is.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I wish the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] would produce the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not going to produce it. Every man is supposed to know the law. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. In the opinion of the Chair the paragraph itself changes existing law, and this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is germane and therefore in order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WEEKS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 53.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 4, strike out "thirty-five" and insert "fifty," so as to read "fifty thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the amendment last adopted:
"And that all contracts entered into shall be let after having advertised for bids, and shall be awarded on the basis of cheapness and efficiency."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to debate the amendment. I would like to put in the RECORD, in support of it, what Mr. Grandfield stated in this connection. It will be found at the bottom of page 98 of the hearings, as follows:

Mr. GRANDFIELD. That is correct. Since then another company has made an offer of this kind: To rent the machines for five years, making a contract for five years at a certain stipulated price, with the understanding that at the expiration of the five years the machines should become the property of the department. The Postmaster-General has recommended that the department be given authority to make contracts for rental of machines for a term of five years, and we have prepared letters to the canceling-machine companies asking for propositions along those lines.

Then the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asked as to the limitation on the period of rental at the present time. Mr. Grandfield replied:

The law officer holds that without specific authority we can not make a contract for a longer period than one year.

The committee brings in a change in the language of this paragraph and authorizes the Postmaster-General to enter into contracts for the rental of canceling machines to cover a period not exceeding three years.

It seems to me that the committee, if it took any cognizance of that situation at all, should have gone all the way and authorized the Postmaster-General to make contracts for five years. But now the provision removes the obstacle, and a great obstacle, from the path of the Postmaster-General in dealing with this situation regarding these machines. Now, he has authority to enter into a three-year contract. He has authority also to purchase some machines, and the only way to settle this question as to whether or not there are certain favored individuals or corporations dealing with the Government in these machines is to throw the whole thing open to the public. Let them bring their machines and submit them to efficiency tests, and state at what price they will rent them and at what price they will sell them. Then let the Postmaster-General or the proper officer make his selection out in the open, where it can be reviewed and where everybody will know what is going on.

Ever since I have been in the House this question of canceling and time-marking machines has been coming up year after year, and nobody has ever been able to satisfy the committee as to the merits of the proposition. Members have arisen in their places and denounced these companies, and denounced the exorbitant rates they were receiving for the rental of their machines, and yet in all these years nobody has ever put himself to enough trouble to get the information to inform the House whether or not the Government was being actually robbed in this connection. This amendment simply enables the concern referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], if it thinks it has an efficient machine which it can furnish to the Government cheaply, to come in before the Postmaster-General, take the efficiency test, and bid for the contract.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I personally have no objection to the amendment, because it still leaves in the hands of the department sufficient latitude so that whatever is cheapness will mean cheapness from the standpoint of efficiency. But I take exception to the statement made by the gentleman from New Jersey, to the effect that nobody has taken any trouble to find out whether the Government was being robbed by these companies. It is true that one of these companies has refused to sell its machines in the past, but the other companies are selling machines. I understand that four out of five of the companies are now selling machines to the Government, or are ready to sell them, at a reasonable price. Furthermore, the fact that the term of contract is limited to three years is directly in line of encouraging different companies to develop new machines. When you make the contract for five years, as the gentleman from New Jersey suggests, we would have a large number of machines made by the present companies under contract, and the manufacturer of a new machine would not have an opportunity to get many of his machines adopted by the Government for years. We have been doing just what the gentleman from New Jersey wants done, and what his proposition to make the contract for five years would prevent being done.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman does not understand my amendment makes it five years?

Mr. WEEKS. No; but that is what your statement made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For car fare and bicycle allowance, $460,000.

Mr. HOBSON. I move to strike out the last word. I do that, Mr. Chairman, merely for the purpose of obtaining information, and to ask the chairman of the committee if the Post-Office Department has a mechanical drafting office from which to evolve for itself mechanical devices, and whether, if they do not, such a development is in contemplation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the department has a commission or board, made up of departmental officials, who make investigations into new labor-saving mechanical devices which may be of use to the department. That is as far as the department has gone in the establishment of such a department. There have been several labor-saving devices adopted recently that have proved to be very useful and economical. For instance, a table has been adopted by the Hudson Terminal, in New York, a new station, which cost $9,000, and by its means they have been able to discharge ten laborers. They have also adopted a labor-saving device in the Chicago office for transferring the mails from one part of the office to another; and in the Washington office they have distributing tables by which they have been able to save 30 per cent of the cost of installation annually. It is the policy of the department to encourage and develop new devices which will be labor saving in character.

Mr. HOBSON. I am simply asking the chairman for information. The particular point I wish to bring out is that since the private and commercial institutions are not engaged in lines of business like those of the Post-Office Department, the Government should not rely entirely upon private enterprise for the invention and development of improved devices for which large royalties and rentals are charged. The Post-Office Department already has extensive shops for bags, locks, and so forth, and, like any other great industrial establishment, should provide regular means not only for testing new devices that are submitted from the outside, but also for originating and developing mechanical devices and improvements of its own. I hope that provision may be made for such a useful extension in the department.

Mr. WEEKS. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is value in the suggestion that the gentleman is making.

Mr. DAWSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this item would cover the investigation or purchase of tieing devices?

Mr. WEEKS. It would.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for carriers absent without pay, City Delivery Service, $31,000,000. And the appointment and assignment of letter carriers hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum; and that the total number of carriers in the service June 30, 1911, shall not exceed 30,000.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order on the following words, beginning in line 20, page 15:

And the appointment and assignment of letter carriers hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I make a point of order on the words in lines 23, 24, and 25:

And that the total number of carriers in the service June 30, 1911, shall not exceed 30,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, now I offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 20, after the word "service," strike out "$31,000,000" and insert "$31,736,300."

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this amendment tends to increase the amount carried in this bill by $736,300. That amount is made up of three items, to wit, one item of $500,000, one of $233,400, and one of $2,900.

My contention is that if you undertake to carry out the provisions of the bill as reported, you fall short of an appropriation by $500,000. In other words, you will not have, to the extent of $500,000, enough money to carry out the provisions provided for in this bill.

Why do I say this? I am going to read to you the statement of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, made before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; you will find it on page 106 of the hearings. The chairman asked him this question:

Now, will you please tell the committee what the condition of the appropriation for letter carriers is?

Mr. GRANDFIELD. Our estimate shows that the annual rate of expenditure for pay of letter carriers on June 30, 1910, will be $30,343,200. We estimate that on July 1, 1910, the following promotions will be authorized: 341 from $600 to $800, 443 from $800 to $900, 437 from $900 to $1,000, 170 from $1,000 to $1,100, and one-half of the carriers in the $1,100 grade at first-class offices, which would be 2,334 from $1,100 to $1,200, making a total of $233,400. Those are promotions at first-class offices. At second-class offices we estimate that there will be 198 promotions from $600 to $800, 221 from $800 to $900, 150 from $900 to $1,000, and 29 from $1,000 to $1,100. That is 50 per cent in that grade.

The CHAIRMAN. In the last grade that you read?

Mr. GRANDFIELD. Only in the last grade $1,000 to $1,100, at second-class offices. That would make the annual rate of expenditure July 1, 1910, $30,829,400.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it you have recommended those increases based upon the whole year as if they had been promoted July 1, 1909.

Mr. GRANDFIELD. That is the number that will have been in those several grades one year on July 1 next, consequently every promotion would take effect July 1. Then I have a statement here showing the probable number that will be promoted on October 1.

The CHAIRMAN. That is those who have not been a year in the service?

Mr. GRANDFIELD. Yes; they will have been a year in the service on October next. I also have a similar statement for January 1, 1911, and for April 1, 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be put in the record.

[Statement not furnished.]

The CHAIRMAN. That makes up a total of how much?

Mr. GRANDFIELD. A total of $31,283,550. We have a credit to deduct from that. That is all for promotions. Then in addition to that we estimate that 1,500 additional carriers will be appointed during the year at an average salary of $370 each, that is to say, their service during the year will average between seven and eight months, so that the average pay will be about $370. That is equivalent to $555,000, making a total of $31,838,550. Our estimated credit by change of grade and lapsed salaries is $338,550, which brings us down to our present estimate of $31,500,000 for the City Delivery Service.

Now, observe there is carried in this bill but $31,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GOEBEL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto may be terminated in twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, that is not practicable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have an amendment to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. GOEBEL. Now, I will read further from this hearing:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you include in these figures the amount for increasing the pay of carriers from $1,100 to $1,200?

Mr. GRANDFIELD. Yes; 50 per cent of those in first-class offices in the $1,100 grade and 50 per cent in second-class offices in the $1,000 grade to $1,100. That is exactly the way the appropriation for the current year was made.

The CHAIRMAN. All the other promotions are automatic?

Mr. GRANDFIELD. Yes. Of course these are outside figures, assuming that every carrier will have a satisfactory record for faithfulness and efficiency and go up a grade in salary. There will be a certain percentage that will not go up; and in all probability the percentage of those who fail of promotion will be larger next year than this year, due to the operation of the efficiency-rating system. In our deduction on account of credit by change of grade and lapsed salaries we have taken that into account, and the credit is a little larger than it would have been otherwise if we did not consider that some of the carriers would fail of promotion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will further observe that the estimate for all purposes, including the necessary promotions in the first and second classes, is $31,838,550; taking into consideration change of grades and lapsed salaries and other conditions, a credit is given of $338,550; deduct that sum and the actual amount that will be needed is $31,500,000; and the committee having provided for only $31,000,000, you are short $500,000. I submit that if you are going to carry out the provisions of this bill you must have the necessary money to do it with.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am coming to discuss the other two items included in my amendment.

This bill provides for promotions into the $1,200 grade of 50 per cent of the letter carriers, or 2,334 carriers. You also promote in the second-class offices, and from the $1,000 to the $1,100 grade 29 carriers, which is 50 per cent.

Now, my amendment will permit promotion of the additional 50 per cent in first-class offices and from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade, and will also promote in the second-class offices all of the carriers from the $1,000 grade into the $1,100 grade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the gentleman from Ohio state whether it would then be obligatory on the department to promote from the fifth to the sixth grade all of these letter carriers whose services and efficiency entitle them to promotion?

Mr. GOEBEL. Under my amendment it would.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And it would not, then, be left to the will and prejudice of the postmaster?

Mr. GOEBEL. Absolutely not, and I am going to speak of that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in 1907 we established a law which provides for six grades. Up to the fifth grade it is automatic, but we halt at the sixth grade. Up to the fifth grade appropriations must be made. Now, to my mind, it never was contemplated that Congress should withhold an appropriation and thereby defeat the promotion of all deserving carriers into the $1,200 grade.

If that be true, then the provision of the law is a delusion. It would be absolutely wrong. There is no reason in the world why that grade should not be as effective as the other grades. What is the result? Here are 20 carriers, all efficient and all entitled to promotion, and here you have a provision which limits the number to 50 per cent. What is the result? One of two things—either the postmaster plays his favorites or he assumes a duty that he ought not to assume.

He must make the choice.

The man entitled to the promotions and not promoted feels aggrieved, and thinks he has not had a fair chance or there has been some discrimination.

[The time of Mr. GOEBEL having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended three minutes.]

Now, such conditions ought not to exist. You have put these carriers upon a basis of efficiency. It is efficiency you want, and whenever he stands that test he is entitled to his promotion. As matters now stand, he is subjected every year to the possibilities that Congress may not make an appropriation, or, making an appropriation to the limit of 50 per cent, that he may then be deprived of his promotion.

Therefore I hope, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment will be adopted that we may add to this bill this $500,000 that is absolutely necessary to carry out the provisions of the bill as the committee intended it, and we ought to make the necessary appropriation to permit all carriers in the first and second class offices to enter into the highest grade whenever their efficiency will permit it.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add just a word or two of indorsement to the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio.

This amendment is to increase from $31,000,000 to $31,765,000 the appropriation for pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for carriers absent without pay, in the City Delivery Service. The object of the amendment is to enable the new salary bill to be carried out according to its original intention. The law provides:

> That after June 30, 1907, clerks in offices of the first and second class and carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades as follows: First grade, salary, $600; second grade, salary, $800; third grade, salary, $900; fourth grade, salary, $1,000; fifth grade, salary, $1,100; sixth grade, salary, $1,200.

It further specifies:

> That clerks and carriers at first-class offices be promoted successively to the fourth grade.

It was believed that the enactment of such salary legislation would be an incentive to faithful and efficient work, and would enable the department to recognize and reward those employees who had shown capability and faithfulness in the discharge of their duties. That it has been such an incentive is proved by the First Assistant Postmaster General, who, in a report made a year after the enactment of the new salary law, declared:

> The passage of the reclassification act has undoubtedly infused into the great army of post-office employees a new spirit of enthusiasm for the service and of loyalty to the department, the effect of which can not be overestimated.

Last year, however, Congress adopted a 50 per cent plan of promotion, according to which postmasters were instructed to refrain from recommending for promotion a greater proportion than 50 per cent of those carriers whose records were such as to warrant their advancement. It is upon this policy that the present departmental estimates are based. The result of this policy is to exclude by the operation of a mere arbitrary rule one-half of those entitled to promotion. It is a distinction clearly unjust and one which betrays a parsimony not at all creditable to the Government [Applause.] I believe this amendment should prevail because intelligent popular sentiment supports it. If those gentlemen who oppose it should return to their districts and consult their constituents, I am satisfied they will find that for every one who may possibly oppose it there are at least one hundred who favor it. If, however, mere popularity were its only recommendation I would not presume to advocate it.

The amendment is just and fair as well. The present salary of post-office employees is small enough. It requires nine years' service before a carrier can advance from a substitute into the first class. Taking the total compensation for those nine years and dividing it by the number of years of service, you will find that in first-class offices his average compensation is $742 annually, and that in second-class offices it amounts to $685.

Here is a table which proves the truth of this last statement:

First-class offices.

Three years, at an average salary of $30 per month, as substitute	$1,080.00
Fourth year, first grade, at annual salary of	600.00
Fifth year, second grade, at annual salary of	800.00
Sixth year, third grade, at annual salary of	900.00
Seventh year, fourth grade, at annual salary of	1,000.00
Eighth year, fifth grade, at annual salary of	1,100.00
Ninth year, sixth grade, at annual salary of	1,200.00
Total salary, nine years	6,680.00
Average salary per year	742.00

Second-class offices.

Three years, at an average salary of $30 per month, as substitute	$1,080.00
Fourth year, first grade, at annual salary of	600.00
Fifth year, second grade, at annual salary of	800.00
Sixth year, third grade, at annual salary of	900.00
Seventh year, fourth grade, at annual salary of	1,000.00
Eighth year, fifth grade, at annual salary of	1,100.00
Total salary, eight years	5,480.00

I think you will concede that this salary is small enough. Add to it the fact that the Bureau of the Census, in Bulletin 94, shows that as an indication of the strenuous character of the work of a letter carrier the average length of service is a little less than nine years, and you will concede that this amendment ought to be carried. The prices of living have advanced, while salaries have remained stationary.

We gentlemen, with a wise view to our own personal interests, the wisdom of which view I know all here will admit, obeyed the dictates of evident justice by increasing our own salaries. [Laughter.] Let us follow the same course and imitate the same righteousness by increasing the salaries of the post-office employees.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that instead of hearing opposition to this amendment, the members of this committee should be so glad to have the opportunity of recording their desire to do justice to the worthy and upright public servants who carry the mails and conduct the business of the post-offices throughout the country, that they would rise and pass it without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in seven minutes.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will make it ten minutes.

Mr. WEEKS. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. KELIHER. About five minutes.

Mr. WEEKS. I shall want some time myself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want some time to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. WEEKS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will make it twelve minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment close in twelve minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he will accord me five minutes?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no time to accord. I want five minutes myself. I do not wish to cut off any gentleman who wishes to speak on the subject.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then I shall object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit a suggestion, that all gentlemen who represent large districts have leave to print their remarks on this subject?

Mr. WEEKS. As that is the only purpose of this debate, I shall be very glad to make that suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that that is not my purpose in asking a question. I want some information.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, with the particular amount of money carried in this appropriation for the maintenance of the carrier service I have no concern. All I want is an assurance from the committee, based upon an intelligent study and calculation of the needs of that branch for 1911, that the amount of money carried will meet the demand, that is strong, not only in this House, but in the country, that the prevailing system in regard to carrier promotions at least will be maintained. Some two years ago, the chairman will recall, that, after a thorough and intelligent debate, the House decided by a vote, which was carried from the committee to a roll call in the House, in favor of vitalizing the $1,200 grade in the carrier service, which had been created in the act of 1907 and allowed to remain without force because of lack of an appropriation. A sufficient sum for this purpose was, by amendment, after thorough discussion, added to the appropriation for 1909. In the following year money enough was provided to promote 50 per cent of the eligibles to the $1,200 class in the first-class offices, and in the second-class offices those eligible for the $1,100 grade.

Now, there is apprehension on the part of those interested lest the lopping off of the $500,000 from the estimate submitted by the Post-Office Department by the committee will necessitate a reduction in these promotions. I believe the policy of Congress, expressed as it was two years ago, should be respected. I call the attention of the committee to this fact, and ask for an assurance that the present reduction will not compel a change of policy by the department in this respect. The reduction in the pending bill invites doubt.

Mr. Chairman, when we appropriated for the current year for this particular item, we appropriated $1,788,500 over the amount appropriated for similar purposes for the year preceding. This year, in the pending bill providing for 1911, we increase the amount over the current year only $1,376,000. This is $400,000, approximately, less in the increase for next year than that for 1910 over 1909. Now, the Postmaster-General in his estimate fixed the amount essential for the continuance of this service at its present standard, allowing for a normal increase of $31,500,000. The first assistant, before the committee, declared that he really needed $31,500,000, but the committee in its wisdom has deemed it best to lop off $500,000. Now, if I can get assurances, based upon an intelligent calculation, that there will be money enough to carry out the established policy that I have mentioned, I have no concern with the amount carried.

I hope and trust that the committee in arriving at its conclusion has not been influenced by the belief that the country will take cognizance in advance of the desire of the committee, which hopes to later enact into law a system which will compel the installation of letter boxes in the private homes of the land, in order to facilitate the distribution of the mail. I further hope and trust that in their calculations they have not figured that a great number of people in the country will anticipate that mandatory provision and volunteer the installation of those boxes. I hope this notion has not been an element of any consequence in the consideration and calculation of the amount of money carried for this item in this bill which may be curtailed.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I reiterate I have absolutely no concern with the amount of money carried, if I can but have the assurance of the committee that the amount of money carried is adequate to meet the demands of the department to provide for the promotions for which Congress has declared—that 50 per cent of the eligibles may be advanced into the $1,200 class in the first-class offices and to the $1,100 in the second class—I am perfectly willing to offer no objection. Now, before taking my seat, I would ask the Chairman if, in his opinion, the $31,000,000, being $500,000 less than the estimate of the department, is considered an adequate amount to provide for the promotions of the 2,727 carriers eligible in the offices of first-class and 1,226 in second-class post-offices?

Mr. WEEKS. When the gentleman from New Jersey has used the time he wishes, I will be very glad to go into details and explain to my colleague why I think $31,000,000 will be ample.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand, the highest salary paid to letter carriers in the second-class offices is $1,100.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand, the great body of the rural free-delivery carriers go out from offices of the second, third, and fourth classes. I would like to inquire how the committee, in making up this bill, were able to fix the salaries of letter carriers in the second class at $1,100 and then the salaries of the rural free-delivery carriers at $900?

Mr. WEEKS. A letter carrier in the classified list who commences at $600 advances $200 the first year and then $100 a year until in the first-class offices he reaches $1,100 and in the second-class offices until he reaches $1,000. It has become the custom to promote 50 per cent of the eligibles from $1,100 to $1,200 in the first-class offices and 50 per cent of the eligibles from $1,000 to $1,100 in second-class offices, but the committee has nothing to do with the workings of the classification system, which is now permanent law.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. How many additional rural routes are provided for in this bill?

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to defer taking that matter up until we reach that subject in the bill?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I want to ask in connection with the increase——

Mr. WEEKS. In the bill $545,000 is provided for that purpose.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio ought to prevail. I trust, at least, that all those on this side of the Chamber will give their votes in favor of the pending amendment. The effect of the amendment, as I understand it, will be to enable the carriers to receive the maximum sum that Congress intended they should receive under recent legislation. In the large cities the cost of living has greatly increased. In the city from which I come, New York, the rents are higher to-day than they have ever been before.

The cost of living has increased immensely, and surely it is not asking too much for a carrier to receive the additional $100 when he reaches the standard of efficiency that entitles him to be placed in the highest grade of his service.

Mr. REEDER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. REEDER. I would like to ask him when he fell into the habit of trying to raise appropriations above what is demanded by the service and by the committee having charge of a bill?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not know what the gentleman means by "falling into the habit," but I am trying to have men adequately paid when they render good, honest, and efficient service to the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REEDER. I want to suggest that the gentleman has fallen into the habit recently of wanting to raise appropriations above what seems necessary.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It is necessary that we should raise this appropriation in order to carry out in good faith what was intended by Congress when we provided for the $1,200 class.

Mr. REEDER. We have a great committee here that has the task of discovering what is required to carry out in good faith what the law contemplates, and they say this bill carries sufficient.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The committee has said it, but I take it that the action of that committee is reviewable by this body now sitting, and we ought to review it in such a way as to provide adequate, decent compensation for a class of employees that are deserving and who have, after years of service, proven their efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more in order to reply to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REEDER. The point I had in mind is this: Is yours not a case where your particular ox is being gored? Is not your motive to raise the appropriation for the benefit of your own constituents?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Not at all.

Mr. REEDER. But when a raise pertains to any other section, you seem to be unable to see your way clear to raise appropriations above what is estimated by the committee in charge.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Not at all. It is a case where I think a man who is deserving of decent wages and ought to receive them at the hands of a great government. I do not believe that the men who have served so long as to entitle them to go into the highest grade ought to be underpaid. We believe they ought to get at least the sum of $1,200.

Mr. REEDER. We will wait with interest to see if the gentleman will favor raising the rural free-delivery pay above $900, when those carriers have much more expense than the city carriers have in serving the Government. Having to own and feed a team or two and the expense of vehicles. Clearly much more expense and also hardship than the city carrier and much less pay.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman will never find me cheeseparing on any proposition. On the contrary, he will always find me ready to vote for decent pay for efficient work. [Applause.]

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the Chairman what provision in this bill has been made for an increase of the salaries of the carriers in second-class cities? It may have been answered, but I would like to go into it a little bit more.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, up to the $1,000 grade we have promoted automatically, as is provided by the classification law, and a provision is made for 50 per cent of those in the $1,000 grade to be promoted to the $1,100 grade.

Mr. HINSHAW. It is in effect a new regulation by this bill or new legislation.

Mr. WEEKS. That is exactly what it was last year.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then there has been substantial relief to the second-class offices.

Mr. WEEKS. A 50 per cent promotion of the $1,000 clerks to the $1,100 grade. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close at twenty minutes to 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] read the hearing given to the First Assistant Postmaster-General on this subject. I will state the changes in the different elements used in making up this appropriation.

This bill makes provision for promotion for all the carriers now in the service, as provided by the classification act, and for the promotion of 50 per cent of those in the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade in first-class offices and 50 per cent of those in the $1,000 grade to the $1,100 grade in second-class offices.

I can not agree with the gentleman from Ohio that all the carriers in the $1,100 grade should by right be promoted to the $1,200 grade. If I understand correctly the classification act, it never intended that should be done. It intended that the department should have some latitude and should select for promotion those men who have shown special qualifications for the work. The same statement would apply to the $1,000 grade in second-class offices. It never was intended that all in the $1,000 grade should be promoted to the $1,100 grade.

I think we make a grave error if we depart from the classification act in that respect, for nothing stimulates a man to do good work as the prospect of some material reward as a result of it. In the estimates of the department the rate of expenditure at the end of this fiscal year is $30,344,200. Automatic promotions from $600 to $1,100 in offices of the first class require $630,275. I am wrong; that includes promotions in both classes of offices to the limit of automatic promotions. Fifty per cent promotions in first-class offices from $1,100 to $1,200 grade, and 50 per cent promotions in the second-class offices from $1,000 to $1,100 grade require $310,075 additional. The department estimated for 1,500 additional carriers at $370 apiece. That number has been reduced by the committee to 1,000, at the same rate. One thousand would require $370,000 or a total of $31,653,530. The department estimates in lapsed salaries and changes in grades a credit of $338,500. Ten per cent automatic promotions which do not occur—that is the experience of the department—would add a credit of $94,000. The First Assistant Postmaster-General estimated that $25,000 can be credited this service by increasing the amount appropriated for assistant postmasters $50,000. Taking these credits from the amounts previously allowed, and we have $31,196,000, and this will provide for 1,000 carriers and all other provisions that anyone contends should be allowed in this bureau.

The number of carriers in the service on the 30th of June, 1909, was 27,630. The number on December 1, 1909, was 27,863. Therefore there were appointed in the first six months of this current year 243 carriers. If the same ratio of appointment of carriers is made as the First Assistant Postmaster-General testified would be necessary in the case of clerks, the total number of carriers appointed during this year will be 328. The number of carriers provided for in the appropriation bill this year was 1,300, leaving a balance to carry over to next year of 972. The committee having provided for 1,000 additional carriers, there will be available for appointment 1,972 carriers during 1911. The methods used in arranging the work of the carriers is being radically changed by the department, and their efficiency has increased. For instance, under the present system of marking carriers it is found that the carrier, instead of routing 6 pieces of mail, has become sufficiently expert so that he routes 20 pieces of mail in a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[By unanimous consent the time of Mr. WEEKS was extended three minutes.]

Mr. WEEKS. There have been various combinations and changes in route. For instance, where a large number of people leave their homes for the summer, one carrier will cover two routes instead of one, and in that way the department has been enabled to get on for six months with 243 additional carriers instead of one-half the number provided in last year's bill, which was 1,300. If we credit the appropriation required to carry out all the purposes of this service, $31,196,000, with the 672 carriers who may not be needed for appointment in 1911, at $370, as they have been figured in making up these estimates, we will have as the net amount required for the year 1911 $30,886,000, or $114,000 less than the amount which is recommended in this bill.

Mr. GOEBEL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. GOEBEL. Where does the gentleman get these figures?

Mr. WEEKS. I get them from the department, and from the hearings, and from the committee estimates.

Mr. GOEBEL. Did the gentleman get the figures from the First Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. WEEKS. Many of them.

Mr. GOEBEL. Then the gentleman will admit that those figures do not correspond with the statement that he made before the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. I admit that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GOEBEL) there were—ayes 53, noes 50.

Mr. WEEKS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WEEKS and Mr. GOEBEL.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 64.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 20, after the word "dollars," insert the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for said purposes unless in the use thereof in promoting carriers in offices of the first class from the fifth to the sixth grade and carriers in offices of the second class from the fourth to the fifth grade preference is given to the senior employees whose record for faithfulness and efficiency during the preceding year is satisfactory to the Post-Office Department."

Mr. WEEKS. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to prevent discrimination in promotions in offices of the first class from the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade, and in offices of the second class from the $1,000 grade to the $1,100 grade.

If I understood correctly, the appropriation contained in the bill will permit the promotion in offices of the first class of 50 per cent of the carriers in the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade, and in offices of the second class it will permit the promotion of 50 per cent of the carriers in the $1,000 to the $1,100 grade.

The object of this amendment is to require that the 50 per cent of the clerks promoted shall be the clerks whose service is longest, provided their records for efficiency are satisfactory to the department.

Mr. REEDER. I desire to raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REEDER. I desire the gentleman from New York to speak to the point of order, as that is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to make a statement as to the merits of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved. The gentleman from New York is in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to speak to the merits of the amendment because I am convinced that once the amendment is understood nobody will be inclined to insist upon the point of order, even if it be good. Assume there are a number of carriers in offices of the first class, say 100 of whom are entitled to promotion from the $1,100 grade to the $1,200; under the appropriation that is to be made, only 50 per cent of these carriers can be promoted; that is, 50 of the 100 from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade.

If these carriers, in efficiency and in the record, be equal, the object of this amendment is to provide that those who have served longest shall be promoted in preference to others in their grade. I can not understand how any legitimate objection can be made to this amendment. It is not designed to promote carriers simply because of seniority, but its object is to give those who have served longest, provided their records are equally good, preference over those who have a shorter service.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's amendment provide for a case where the records are equally good for efficiency?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in that language. It provides for preference where the record of efficiency and faithfulness is satisfactory to the department, and as the department must make the promotions upon the efficiency record and determine the efficiency, it still leaves it considerable power. I do not wish to make any statement that may seem to be unfair in this discussion. If a postmaster should determine that two clerks, one serving a longer time than another in this class, have records which are satisfactory, and if there be a limitation upon the number that can be promoted, why should not the man that has served the longest be given preference in promotion?

As to the point of order, I submit that this is merely a limitation on the appropriation, and I want to call the attention of the Chair to a decision——

Mr. REEDER. If a point of order has not been made, why does the gentleman wish to argue it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might finish and the gentleman from Massachusetts might insist on the point of order, and the Chair might decide it without any light from me.

Mr. REEDER. It seems to me that until the point of order is made there is no use to argue it. I want to save discussion on both sides if I can, and if a point of order is not presented what is the use to discuss it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. I have reserved the point of order in order to let the gentleman from New York make his speech.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will agree to accept the amendment I will say nothing further.

Mr. WEEKS. No; I am going to insist on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the decision on page 658 of Hinds's Precedents, volume 4.

I myself offered, on the 27th of March, 1906, an amendment in this language:

Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended unless the programme for the conference contains provision for discussion of reciprocal trade relations between the countries participating in the conference.

At the time there was under consideration a provision in a deficiency bill which read as follows:

To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates from the United States to the Third International Conference of American States, to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, beginning on the 21st of July, 1906, and salaried clerical assistance, to be expended under the discretion of the Secretary of State, to continue available during the fiscal year of 1907, $60,000.

A point of order was interposed to the amendment, and was overruled on the ground that the amendment was a limitation on the appropriation. The pending amendment proposes that the money shall not be expended for the purposes enumerated unless certain requirements be followed as to the method of promotion. It seems to me that this is clearly within the decision to which I have called to the attention of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would be in sympathy with the gentleman from New York in his amendment if he had provided for promotion where the records were of equal efficiency, but under the amendment offered by the gentleman, wherever a person long in service is not promoted, it will instantly be taken as a declaration by the department that he is not an efficient carrier.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest that if the amendment is before the House for consideration the gentleman may convince me that perhaps that modification should be made.

Mr. MANN. That would be a good suggestion to make to a Member who has not been here as long as I have. [Laughter.] I presume that the Chair has the amendment in front of him. It seems to me that it is not a limitation on the appropriation, but is an offer of a trade.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, that is not prohibited by the rules.

Mr. MANN. There is no limitation on the appropriation, except to say that the appropriation shall not be expended unless the Post-Office Department violates the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it does not amount to that.

Mr. MANN. It is not a limitation on the appropriation, but a proposition to trade, a proposition to the department to violate the law. The law now provides that these promotions shall be made by the department at its discretion. Here is a proposition, not to limit the expenditure of the appropriation, but stating that the appropriation shall not be used at all for any purpose, unless the department violates the existing rule of law. Now, it does not seem to me that that is a limitation on the appropriation at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken, because for all the gentleman knows the suggestion contained in this amendment is the rule now followed by the department. I was inclined to believe that the gentleman would base his objection to the amendment upon the theory that it was unnecessary because this rule is now followed by the department.

Mr. MANN. Even if the rule were now followed by the department that would not change the position, so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a limitation upon the appropriation, because it specifically provides that the appropriation shall not be expended except under certain conditions.

Mr. FASSETT. It provides it shall be expended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, because I am more familiar with what the amendment says.

Mr. MANN. It reads:

No part of this appropriation shall be used for said purposes unless in the use thereof in promoting carriers of the first class—

And so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, I read the amendment to which I called the attention of the Chair:

That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended unless the programme for the conference contains provision for a discussion of reciprocal trade relations between the countries participating in the conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the distinction is quite clear. In that case there was no law on the subject. There was no change of existing law by the limitation. In this, what purports to be a limitation is a direction to the department—

That no part of the appropriation shall be used unless—

The department violates the law. That is taken by the department as a change of law. There have been frequent rulings that where a purported limitation would have to be construed by the department as a change of law or as useless, that that must be construed as a change of law, and hence would be obnoxious to the rule and not a mere limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York bases his contention that this is not new legislation, but a limitation, upon the ground that the money need not be expended at all; that he provides that if it be expended, it must be expended under the amendment which he proposes; but if you take that view of it, he changes the classification act. The classification act makes the promotions mandatory, and if he really seriously asserts that under his amendment the promotions need not be made, then he asserts that he is repealing or modifying the classification act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman state in what respect it modifies the classification act?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The gentleman has just stated himself that this was a limitation, because it was on the assumption that the money need not be expended; but if expended, must be expended under his amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true. That is the only way one can make a limitation.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Very well. If it need not be expended, then you suspend the operations of the classification act and are making a change in existing law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. It is one thing to change the law and it is another thing to appropriate to carry out the law.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That does not meet the question. I want to go further. If it does not suspend the operation of the classification act, then that act goes on in its operation, and this provision absolutely destroys or takes away the existing discretion in the Postmaster-General, so that, from either point of view, it is evidently new legislation proposed upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It seems to the Chair that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York gives affirmative directions to an executive officer in a way which constitutes a change of existing law. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 20, after the word "dollars," insert:

"Provided, That if the appropriation is adequate, the Postmaster-General may authorize an annual leave of thirty days' absence to all carriers."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard upon the point of order? If not the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 20, after the word "dollars," insert:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for making more than two deliveries of mail each day except to business houses, and then only when at least six business houses are found in one city block."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I make this amendment in the interest of economy. Evidently from the size of this appropriation it would make quite a saving, and, in addition to that, I offer this amendment in the interest of the people who receive this mail in the residence districts of the cities. When these mail deliveries occur four, five, six, and seven times a day it requires about one servant to take care of the door and receive the mail, and it is certainly of very little use to the people receiving the mail, and in order to save the citizen the trouble of serving these carriers and also in the interest of economy, I offer this amendment. Now, I desire to say a word on the point of order that is made against the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does the gentleman have any carrier cities in his district where they have five or six deliveries a day?

Mr. REEDER. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman was undertaking to tell what would happen in this case. Does not the gentleman think that he might leave that to districts represented by people where they have these deliveries who may know something about it?

Mr. REEDER. I have my information in that line from the numerous mail deliveries in this city. My mail all comes to my office—that is, all that is of any importance—and it takes half the time of a servant to take in advertisements of one kind and another delivered by a mail carrier. So I realize that the people in the city, while you Members representing such districts would probably not be willing to vote for this amendment, yet you are fully aware that such frequent calls of the carrier are a great nuisance to the people——

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REEDER. I wish to talk to the point of order, as I have only five minutes. I wish to say in regard to the point of order I do not believe it is subject to the point of order, because it simply directs as to the use of a portion of this appropriation. This is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices already established, $1,100,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

CLAIMS.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims have one hour after the reading of the Journal to-morrow to consider only claims that have been reported on the Private Calendar and to consider those in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that bills reported from the Committee on Claims on the Private Calendar may be considered for one hour immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that they shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interfere with that except to remind the Chair that the matter which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] had up this morning went over until after the reading of the Journal. I do not know how long it will take to consider that.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker, I think, without violating any confidence, I can say that I have had an interview with Mr. RAINEY and it will not take a half a minute; and if he were here now, it would not take half a minute.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois what these claims are?

Mr. PRINCE. These are small uncontested claims that have been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Your request, then——

Mr. MANN. It is made so as to go ahead with the post-office bill after the hour is over.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is the gentleman asking unanimous consent to have these considered and all other bills on the calendar go off?

Mr. PRINCE. No. To-morrow is claims day. Ordinarily I would be entitled to the whole day. I do not want to obstruct the public work.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] can yield the floor to the post-office bill after the hour, if he desires.

Mr. MANN. This is to consider bills in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 6051. An act to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to reconstruct, maintain, and operate its railway bridges across the Escambia Bay, Choctawhatchee River, and Apalachicola River, in the State of Florida.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

S. 5705. An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RICHARDSON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, change of reference was made of the bill (S. 2441) for the relief of the next of kin of C. A. Weed and the legal representatives of A. P. H. Stewart, from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on War Claims.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Saginaw River, Michigan (H. Doc. SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1910.

(Continuation of legislative day of Thursday, March 3, 1910.)

The Senate resumed its session at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is entitled to the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crane	Heyburn	Rayner
Bankhead	Crawford	Hughes	Richardson
Beveridge	Cullom	Johnston	Root
Borah	Cummins	Jones	Scott
Bourne	Curtis	Kean	Shively
Bradley	Davis	La Follette	Simmons
Brandegee	Depew	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Brown	Dick	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Bulkeley	Dillingham	Martin	Smoot
Burkett	Dixon	Money	Stephenson
Burnham	Flint	Nixon	Sutherland

Burton	Frye	Overman	Taylor
Carter	Gallinger	Owen	Warner
Chamberlain	Gamble	Page	Warren
Clapp	Gore	Paynter
Clarke, Ark.	Guggenheim	Perkins
Clay	Hale	Piles

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators have responded to the roll call. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13410) entitled "An act to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 6051. An act to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to reconstruct, maintain, and operate its railway bridges across the Escambia Bay, Choctawhatchee River, and Apalachicola River, in the State of Florida;

H. R. 18681. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of Phil. H. Sheridan Post, No. 34, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, of Salem, Mass., remonstrating against placing the statue of Gen. R. E. Lee in Statuary Hall, United States Capitol; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

A. J. G. KANE.

Mr. DEPEW presented papers to accompany the bill (S. 6651) to correct the military record of A. J. G. Kane; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 6936) granting an increase of pension to Maggie E. Swank, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted an amendment relative to a survey of Key West Harbor, Florida, with a view to removal of coral heads, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DEPEW submitted an amendment relative to the survey of the Narrows of Lake Champlain, New York and Vermont, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE CUTTER FOR KEY WEST, FLORIDA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1381) to provide for the construction of a revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of Key West, Florida.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CUMMINS to the amendment of Mr. SMOOT.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FLINT. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to make a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I am engaged in the joint committee of the Senate and House investigating the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy and will not be present to-day. I desire to announce the fact that I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I would vote with the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] on the bill and all amendments, and the senior Senator from Texas, if present, would vote against the bill and such amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not rise last evening for the purpose of discussing at length the bill or the pending amendment, and I do not desire to do so this morning. I did not believe that there was any necessity for the amendment which has been proposed, and it seemed to me that there were many reasons why it should not become a part of the bill.

The proviso which has been submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was proposed as a part of the bill at a very late hour of the discussion of this measure. What I arose to say yesterday evening, and what I desire to repeat this morning, is that there has been no reason as yet submitted to the Senate why this radical departure from the original purpose of the bill has been invoked at this time.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] stated last evening that it was his purpose to state to the Senate some facts and reasons why he believed this amendment, or rather his amendment, which, I take it, is in principle the same as the amendment of the Senator from Utah, should become a part of the bill. In view of that statement, Mr. President, and as the Senator from New York proposes to proceed, and in view of the further fact that I am perfectly willing to support the measure, if it can be justified, I am going to yield this morning to the Senator from New York to discuss the measure. However, I will state, before I take my seat, that I regard the amendment as being so objectionable that I should want a controlling reason for its adoption before I would consent myself to vote for it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the amendment which was introduced by me on the 8th of February provides that the money received at the post-offices, for which the Government of the United States becomes responsible to the depositors, shall be invested in the securities of the United States, and that whenever and to the extent that securities of the United States are not available for authorized issue or for purchase at prices deemed by said trustees to be reasonable, the funds so received shall be deposited in the banks, leaving the provisions as to the distribution of the deposits in the localities where they are received, as those provisions are contained already in the bill.

A somewhat similar provision has been included in an amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and I think a similar one in an amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY].

In offering the amendment I had, sir, an idea of what a postal savings bank is and ought to be. It seemed to me that that idea was based upon the universal experience to which the advocates of the bill appealed. A savings bank is, and always has been since such an institution was first known to men, an institution for the investment of savings. Such are all savings banks that are known to the laws of our States, such are all savings banks known in the civilized countries of the world, such are the postal savings banks of all civilized countries, so far as I have been able to ascertain—institutions which receive the slender funds of the poor too small in amount for individual investment in the great enterprises of the world, owned by men too unfamiliar with the great business of the world to make investments, placing them, aggregated in amount, in the hands of wise and experienced trustees, placing them in such investments that they can receive their share of the wealth produced in the great industrial enterprises of our age. I say such is the savings bank and such is the postal savings bank, so far as it has been known to us or to anyone in the past.

And, sir, I have a conception of a postal savings-bank bill which would make it a means by which at the same time thrift should be encouraged among the people of our country, confidence in the safety of their earnings, which would make them willing to deny themselves in order that their earnings might accumulate, a bill which would afford the opportunity to the people of our country to save their earnings and at the same time afford them an opportunity to invest their earnings in the support of their Government, which would release the Government of the United States from the necessity of going to the great bankers of the world in order to obtain the means by which it might carry out the great enterprises for which we have determined to charge a portion of the expense upon future generations.

A few years ago, sir, there was a violent attack, to my mind most unjust, upon President Cleveland because he went to a great banking firm in the city of New York to place bonds that it was necessary to sell in order to sustain the credit of the Government. There was nowhere else for him to go. At the outbreak of the Spanish war an effort was made by the Congress to enact provisions under which the bonds that it was necessary for us to sell to pay the expenses of the war should be offered to the people, and they were widely advertised for public subscription. Who got them, sir? The bankers and the brokers; and if the people obtained any portion of them they had to go to the brokers' offices to get them.

I had an idea of a postal savings-bank bill which would enable the Government of the United States to plant itself upon the industry, the thrift, the accumulated earnings of the great body of the people of the United States, which would enable the man who works with his hands on the farm or in the factory to have his little stake in the Government of the United States by the investment of his earnings through a postal savings bank in the securities issued by his Government. And that idea, sir, was in conformity to all the conceptions of a postal savings bank that had ever before come to light.

Sir, that I understand and believe to be the kind of a postal savings bank that the convention of my party declared for in their last national assemblage; that, sir, I believe to be the kind of a postal savings bank which the President of the United States declared for in his message to Congress; and it was to bring about the enactment of such a bill that my amendment was introduced.

Mr. President, as the bill stands a widely different conception is embodied in it. I do not say, sir, that it is a conception which has not merits; I do not say that it is a conception which is not capable of being embodied in legislation which is constitutional, which is prudent; but I do undertake to say, sir, that that conception as it is embodied in the present bill is neither prudent, wise, nor constitutional.

The conception is, the whole scheme and purpose of the bill is, to provide for the receipt of deposits in the post-offices of the country and the immediate transfer of those deposits to the neighboring bank, and the retention of the deposits in the neighboring bank until returned to the depositor, the Government of the United States interposing and acting as the agent for the receipt and conveyance of the deposit to the bank, and guaranteeing the deposit by assuming the position of principal debtor. Now, sir, it is apparent that that is widely different from any postal savings bank or any other savings bank that ever has been known.

I am not going to discuss the question of constitutionality. It has already been presented in a manner worthy of the best days of the Senate of the United States by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] upon the one side, and by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], and other Senators upon the other side.

I am not going to weary the indulgence of the Senate by entering upon that discussion; but, sir, I can not take my seat in this discussion without recording my protest against the treatment of the deliberate and intelligent discussion of the question whether the laws that we are considering are in conformity to the limitations of the Constitution as a subject for derision, or jests, or sneers. I would not be counted, sir, among those who think the Constitution of the United States is an outworn instrument, to be neglected or evaded at will.

The pathway of all popular governments that have seen fit to do whatever at the moment seemed best in their sight is the pathway of civil war, and it is the embodiment of the great and fundamental rules of right in our written Constitution, the embodiment in that instrument of those limitations upon official power which are essential to the maintenance of freedom, that has enabled this country to maintain this Government of just and equal laws for these many years. I hope the time will never come when the Senate of the United States does not listen with respect and grateful appreciation to such discussion of our constitutional power as we have had during the pendency of this bill.

It is our duty, sir, to set for ourselves, according to our own judgments and our own consciences, the rule of constitutional limitation, not to act as it may seem to us to be expedient to act, trusting to the courts alone to undo our action if it be wrong. And, Mr. President, I deem it my duty in governing my own conduct and in expressing my opinions regarding this bill to my fellow-Senators to say that without the amendment that I introduced or some one of these other amendments embodying the idea of investment in government bonds, the bill is not within the constitutional power of Congress. I do not think that as it now stands it can be brought within the just description of any means necessary and appropriate or adapted or suitable or tending toward the exercise of any of the powers conferred.

Sir, these amendments—the amendment which I introduced, the amendment which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] introduced, and the others—do furnish as the primary and substantial object of the legislation the gathering up of the small earnings of the great body of the people of the country for the use of their Government in the exercise of the borrowing power. Their inclusion in the bill, or the inclusion of any one of them, would furnish a clear constitutional basis for our action. The amendment introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was the furthest extent to which the gentlemen of the committee, and other gentlemen who had taken active part in the development of this measure, felt able to go in the direction of the amendment introduced by me and the amendments introduced by the other Senators whom I have named. It is not satisfactory to me; it does not go by any means to the extent to which I wish it to go or to the extent to which I think it ought to go; but I do think it does furnish probably a constitutional basis for the proposed legislation, because it would present a purpose on the part of Congress to gather these earnings from the people and put them in such a position that the Government can call upon them whenever it has real need.

The amendment introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] seems to me to be wholly illusory and worthless for any purpose whatever, and to be practically equivalent to a wiping out from the proposed statute the idea of government investment as any part of the purpose of this bill.

But, Mr. President, there is another view to take of this legislation, which is more serious, if anything can be more serious, than the question of constitutional power. It is a question that presses upon me with greater force, because it is a question that we have to solve here and upon which our mistake can not be remedied by any court. In what position would this legislation place the United States as to its financial life? What is it that we propose to do by this bill as it now stands? It is to impose upon the Government of the United States an obligation estimated at $500,000,000, payable on demand, and to meet which it has no resources except deposits spread throughout all the banks of the country—22,000 and more of them—national banks, state banks, banks a majority of which are not under the superintendence or supervision of the National Government. I do not say, sir, that they may not be under good supervision—the supervision of some of the States is very good, and the supervision of some of the States is very bad and very defective and inefficient—but a great majority of these banks are not within the supervision of the Government of the United States. It is powerless to protect itself, except that it may take bonds of indemnity—bonds of indemnity for $500,000,000! The memory of some of us goes back to times before surety companies, when personal bonds were given to the United States. They piled up in all the district attorneys' offices of the country, practically worthless.

These banks are not required to keep any reserve. How many States require their banks to have reserves? Some doubtless do; many certainly do not. The Government of the United States is to incur a liability of $500,000,000, payable on demand, with no means to meet it except money scattered through 20,000 banks, the majority of which are not under its supervision, which are not required to maintain a reserve, and the credit of the United States depends upon their responding, and substantially all of them responding, to its instant demands.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. If this $500,000,000 were invested in bonds of the United States, and the sum were demanded for payment, from what source would the Government make that payment?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator's question in the due course of the development of an idea which I suppose that I have. I am pointing out now, sir, the situation in which this bill as it now stands would place the Government of the United States. What other things might be done I shall presently discuss.

Will you go with me back to some of the events in our financial history? For many years we have had a regularly recurring series of financial panics. Our financial system in some way fails to respond with the right reaction to the mysterious movements of public feeling and sentiment and interest in the great trade and financial affairs of the world.

We all know that there is a misfit somehow, so that when the string is drawn tight in the finances of the world our system is pulled the wrong way. There has been much argument about it, but evermore we come out of the same door wherein we went. We have a monetary commission now seeking to solve the problem, after long deliberation and investigation, unable to commend to us a suitable conclusion; but that lack of proper relation between our financial system and the ever recurring possibilities of trade and finance is a fixed and admitted fact. No one disputes it. Our only dispute is as to how to remedy it, and we have not yet found how to remedy it. But there are certain distinct and specific facts to be observed in all these successive crises and failures of the system to respond to the demands of the financial movements of the world; and one of those is that always when certain conditions come from causes beyond our control, so far as we have yet been able to escertain, the banks are unable to pay. Confidence is lost; confidence is destroyed. The creditor no longer trusts his debtor, but seeks to collect the debt. The bank calls its loans. There is contraction throughout the length and breadth of the land. Panic comes. As the battle turns to the rout of the defeated army, as the crowd chokes the door of the theater in fire and tramples each the other down, panic seizes our people, and the banks are unable to respond.

I am not theorizing, Mr. President, but speaking under the compulsion of long experience and of anxious days and nights passed in responsible professional and official relations in every panic that has occurred, beginning with that of 1873 and ending with that of 1907.

Mr. President, when those times come, as come they will again, where will this bill leave the Government of the United States, with $500,000,000 of obligations, and no means to meet them except the banks, which can not pay the Government any more than they can pay the individual? Then, sir, under the working of this bill, instead of a few banks and brokers and merchants going to the wall, the Government of the United States will suspend payment. The credit of our country will be dragged in the dust, and what will then become of our financial and industrial system? During all these series of financial distresses the Government of the United States has stood like a rock unshaken. Confidence in her was never shaken, and never has wavered since those anxious days of 1879, when we first learned that courage was the basis of confidence and that the way to resume was to resume.

Mr. President, why has the Government of the United States retained and merited the confidence that has been awarded to her? Because behind $350,000,000 of our United States and treasury notes we have, first, the working balance in our Treasury; we have, second, $150,000,000 in gold coin and bullion in our vaults; and we have, third, authority by law to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $50,000,000 more in 3 per cent certificates for the purpose of maintaining the parity. Against $350,000,000 of the obligation of the United States now outstanding we hold $150,000,000 of gold in our vaults, and, not content with that, we have authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $50,000,000 more of certificates. But this bill proposes, as against $500,000,000 of new demand obligations, to put nothing but the obligation of the banks, that all experience shows is worthless in time of panic. Mr. President, instead of giving the credit of the United States to our poor, to our industrious workers, we impose upon the United States the weakness of our defective banking system.

I will answer now the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. What is it that has enabled the United States to come to the rescue of our disordered finances in times of distress? It is the power of issuing and selling bonds of the United States. What was it that stopped the panic of 1907? It was that in the President's room, under the authority conferred by Congress, a notice was prepared and signed by the Secretary of the Treasury that he was prepared to sell, and would sell, the bonds authorized for the building of the Panama Canal and the $50,000,000 of certificates authorized by the statute for the maintenance of parity. The world knew that those securities of the United States meant cash, because the instant they were put out they could be returned to the Treasury and be made the basis for the issue of currency. That, sir, is the one and only life-preserver that we have now in our financial system.

What do you do here? You not only impose this enormous obligation upon the United States, with no reserve, putting it at the mercy of the banks, but you propose to refuse to put into the hands of the Government any power to protect itself by its own securities; for, sir, if the trustees under this bill were permitted, under the amendment I have proposed or even under the amendment the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has submitted, to put a reasonable proportion of the money deposited into the securities of the United States, they would be in a position where, as trustees for the protection of their trust, they could any day put those securities out on the market and realize the money with which they could meet the obligations of the Government. That is one thing that is not a matter of theory in all this hurly-burly of financial discussion that the ability to put out into the market securities of the United States always will realize cash. My proposal is that the trustees of this so-called "postal savings bank" shall have put into their hands, to a reasonable degree, the only means that ever has been known in our financial history always and certainly to realize the cash to meet the obligations that are imposed upon our Government.

I say, Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah does not go as far as I think it ought to go, but it appears to be the best that there is any prospect or possibility of getting included in this bill. Therefore I hope that that amendment will be adopted by the Senate to its full extent.

Mr. President and Senators, it is all very well for us to labor over provisions for encouraging thrift, for enlarging the functions of our postal service, but there rests upon us a higher duty, a duty that we can not on our consciences ignore, and that is to safeguard the credit of our country. Upon my oath as a Senator I can not assent to a measure which I am sure, as it now stands, will imperil—gravely imperil—that credit, the good name of our country, and the perpetuity of our prosperous industry and happy life. I beg of you not to permit any consideration, administration or no administration, Democratic or Republican, to lead us away from the pathway of scrupulous regard for the sacred credit and good name of our country.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator from Oklahoma proceeds, with the consent of the Senator from New York, I should like to ask him a question with regard to his amendment. I should like to inquire whether the amendment is designed to apply to bonds held by private parties, or whether it is intended to apply to bonds which shall be issued by the Government and paid for with this fund, and the bonds held theoretically in the place of the fund so displaced or from which the money is taken?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will allow me, the amendment was prepared with a view to its being applied primarily to the bonds the issue of which is in contemplation or which may be authorized hereafter. We have now authorized two hundred and ninety million, five hundred and odd thousand of 3 per cent bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal. About $105,000,000 has been already expended from the Treasury of the United States for that purpose, to be reimbursed by the issue of a portion of that two hundred and ninety millions of bonds. The Senate has just passed a bill providing for the issue of $30,000,000 of certificates for the purposes of the reclamation projects. There are other matters which are likely to come along from time to time which will lead to the issue of other bonds. So there are now $320,000,000 bonds the issue of which is authorized, and which, it seems to me, would undoubtedly more than absorb all the money which it would be deemed necessary and suitable to invest in the securities of the United States; but it did appear to me that it might be desirable at times, when there were no issues in the future—for we are legislating for many years to come—for the trustees to purchase bonds already issued. The amount of the deposits might grow out of proportion to the issue of securities, so that securities might get out into the hands of the people at a time when it is not considered desirable to put the trust fund into them, but afterwards it might be desirable. In that view it seemed, as the trustees would be acting as trustees, that it would be their duty to buy the bonds which they could get at a rate most favorable to the trust, beginning probably with 4 and 3 per cents, of which we have already $182,000,000 outstanding. I should hardly think that there was any practical possibility or probability of their touching or in any way approaching the $730,000,000 of 2 per cents which are outstanding.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, it would be fair—and I address the inquiry to the Senator from New York—in discussing his speech and his amendment to assume or take the position that the amendment does include, I will say primarily, the proposition of the trustees taking these funds and purchasing bonds that are to be issued in the future and the bonds representing to the fund the money that had been so used. Would that be a fair proposition to deduce from the Senator's argument?

Mr. ROOT. I do not think I quite get the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. CLAPP. I say, would this be a fair deduction from the Senator's argument and from the Senator's amendment—that the purpose of the Senator's amendment is to provide that these trustees may take of these funds and invest in bonds to be issued in the future, the bonds theoretically standing as to the fund in the relation of the money that had thus been taken from the fund?

Mr. ROOT. Precisely.

Mr. CLAPP. I desired to have that explained. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for his courtesy.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I was one of the subcommittee that reported this bill, and was willing to give it my support as a Senator representing one of the great States of the Union in default of a better plan, because it provided on its face that the money which was to be drawn from the body of the people should be retained in the community from which it was to be drawn, by deposit in the post-offices of the United States and by such post-offices in the neighboring state and national banks, and this is the only condition under which I could give my assent to the bill on the ground of substantial good policy. It is not good policy to draw from the people of this country the savings of the individuals in the several communities and concentrate them in the great financial centers, and to that proposition I am unalterably opposed. I approve neither the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] nor the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], for the substantial reason that the purpose of both amendments is to take the money from the small communities and concentrate it in the great financial centers, where there is no substantial need for it.

The constitutional argument against this bill, as a whole, has not appealed to me as sound in its conclusion. I think there is no substantial force in the argument made against the constitutionality of the proposed bill, or that the emendment either of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or from New York [Mr. ROOT] is needed to make the bill constitutional. I think this bill is constitutional, because, first, it is a reasonable and proper extension of the postal system of the United States, in accordance with the judgment of modern men, who throughout the whole world have improved the postal system of each of the civilized nations by adding the postal-savings system as a part of it.

The whole country has acquiesced heretofore in the deposit of money in the post-offices of this country—the deposit of money with the postmaster and taking from the postmaster a money order. What is that if it be not a deposit? And when a citizen buys a money order and transmits that money order to the end of the country, and it is paid by another one of the post-offices of the United States, it is a banking transaction which is a legitimate extension of the postal system. This system so extended has been acquiesced in by the entire American people.

No man has questioned the constitutionality of that method of administering the postal system; this proposed postal savings system is merely an extension of the present system. Both systems comprise a deposit and repayment, the only substantial difference being that now under the proposed postal savings system the people are invited to buy these money orders by being given interest upon such purchase of money orders payable on demand, while under the present system no interest is paid.

In so far as concerns the argument that the bill will be made constitutional by the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the answer is that without such amendment the United States does borrow money and does pay interest upon it when it receives these deposits. The constitutional right to borrow money being conceded, the purpose of the Government in exercising such constitutional right, wise or unwise, will not negative the authority. This borrowing of money in this form provides a vast additional reserve which makes available a good market for the bonds of the United States in the event that the United States for any purpose—of peace or of war—desires to sell its securities and is justified by other sound reasons of governmental policies.

I was somewhat amazed at the argument of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that the United States would be required to suspend payment if a financial panic should occur because of its obligation to meet the demand payment of $500,000,000 to the depositors in the postal savings system and universal financial ruin follow.

What financial foundation is there for such a suggestion to the Senate of the United States when our universal experience is to the exact contrary? We all know that in the last panic men drew their money from banks and rushed to the post-office to buy money orders in order to get the security of the Government; and the very establishment of the postal savings system would constitute the most powerful factor against the possibility of panic in the United States. Panic, after all, is due to financial fear.

Depositors may be afraid of banks, and particularly of speculative banks, such as precipitated the Morse-Heinze failure in New York, but the depositors in this country have never yet shown themselves to be afraid of the Government of the United States or of its financial stability with its taxing power of $1,000,000,000 per annum. And what does it mean when we are told that we may save ourselves from panic by selling the bonds of the United States, and that we can not avoid the danger of panic when we open the post-offices of the United States as a haven for the timid depositor, as a safe place to which timid individuals may go when for any reason they shall become afraid of the local bank?

If we invest these funds in the bonds of the United States will we be any more able to pay the cash demands of $500,000,000 due the postal savings depositors which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] so brilliantly imagines will be precipitated upon us by panic?

No. Mr. President and Senators, we should, in that contingency, be confronted with the sale of $500,000,000 of bonds in time of a panic, when, according to the troubled dreams of the Senator from New York, the people had no confidence in the government promises to pay and the banks had all suspended.

The Senator from New York proves too much by his tragic prophecy. He proves his own amendment utterly worthless.

His own amendment, in such a contingency, would be totally inadequate to meet the cash payment of $500,000,000, for his bonds would not be salable.

The dramatic and piteous appeal of the Senator from New York to stand by the credit of the country is not necessary. The credit of the United States is in no danger whatever from the pending bill, either with or without the amendment proposed by either the Senator from Utah or that of the Senator from New York. The United States has abundant resources from which to draw money if any of these depositors should, perchance, become afraid of the Government of the United States and its stability. It will have over 22,000 banks from which to draw, which now have, without adding the postal savings deposits, over fifteen thousand millions of resources. And what may be reasonably anticipated as the extent of the demand of postal savings depositors in time of panic? Mr. President, we may well judge the future by the past, and the panic of 1907 showed that the withdrawal from the private savings banks was confined almost exclusively to the actual daily needs of the depositors, while the Post-Office Department received millions of dollars on deposit without interest during the period of financial stringency, merely because of the greater confidence of depositors in the safety of the Government than in the safety of the banks.

What will be the demand of those depositors who in times of panic are alleged to be afraid of the stability of the United States? And how large a demand will they make? I venture the suggestion based upon the experience of this country and the prophecy that never will there be any demand whatever for such a purpose, but only for actual use of currency, and this means merely circulation from one citizen to another and does not mean hoarding—the chief danger of former panics.

There is not the slightest danger of any impairment whatever of the credit of the United States under the system proposed by the bill in its present form in times of peace or of panic, but the exact contrary. The system will minimize danger of panic, and if there were a panic among speculators or among banks the postal deposits would increase precisely in degree as confidence in banks were impaired.

I would like to see, in default of a better system, a postal savings system established in this country. As far as the people of the United States can express their opinion under the Constitution and governmental party forms that we have, they have expressed the opinion that this bill is constitutional, and the leaders of both great parties have proposed as party issues the establishment of the postal savings system, and the voters in the last national election have approved such system as constitutional. The people are right about it. The bill is constitutional.

I have no fear whatever but that this bill, if it is passed without these amendments, will prove a useful measure, but with these amendments, proposing to draw the money from the people of the country to concentrate it in the cities, I do not see how those who represent the several States of the Union, except those who enjoy the locality of the great financial centers, can give it their assent.

I had intended to give my support to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that in times of war these funds might be used, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if there should come a war the war will be declared by the Congress of the United States, and then will be time enough to make provision for it. I shall not agree even to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Iowa. I regret to find myself at such a serious difference of opinion with the learned Senator from New York. It is a difference of policy. It is a difference of policy that is irreconcilable. I represent a constituency that would never consent to it, and while I represent them I shall give voice to what I know to be their opinions as well as my own judgment, and I shall vote accordingly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, a word with reference to the parliamentary situation. As far as the matter directly in issue is concerned, the bill as originally reported by the committee in simple terms provided that the money when received by the postmasters should be deposited in the local banks under certain conditions prescribed in the act itself. The moneys thus deposited might be invested by the board of trustees in certain classes of securities as prescribed in the bill. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], during the course of the consideration of the measure, presented, and the Senate adopted, an amendment which I will read at length. It is as follows:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees as herein provided shall only be withdrawn to pay depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed from time to time by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

Upon the interjection of that amendment into the bill the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and other Senators of like mind determined that a prohibition upon the power of the Government to control the funds for which it stood responsible to depositors rendered the bill, by an affirmative declaration, devoid of any public purpose, and therefore unconstitutional. Without venturing any opinion as to the correctness of that view, I state unequivocally that it was entertained by a sufficient number of Senators to render impossible the passage of this bill with that provision within it. The bill could not be passed if that provision should be retained.

In order to meet this difficulty and to reconcile conflicting views, in the interest of success, the Senator from Utah, after liberal conferences with others entertaining views similar to his own, after very general conferences with those at whose suggestion and with whose aid he had secured the incorporation of the original amendment, proposed this as a substitute for the amendment adopted, together with an additional portion of the text. In lieu of the matter stricken out, which amendment includes the amendment of the Senator previously adopted, the amendment now pending, to which the Senator from Iowa offers his amendment, reads:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

This, as the Senator from New York avers, was not entirely satisfactory to him. He would far rather have had the amendment offered by himself or the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, or the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, providing directly and primarily for the investment of this money in the bonds of the United States.

But by way of accommodating judgment and opinion to a general purpose, the Senator from New York and others of his way of thinking acceded to this as a fair compromise which would preserve the idea of a public purpose in connection with the borrowed money.

Now, comes forward the Senator from Iowa with an amendment which confines this public purpose to the unusual and extraordinary event of war alone.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose, as the Senator from Montana will concede, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa does cover the subject of a public purpose.

Mr. CARTER. I concede that, Mr. President.

That amendment proceeds upon the theory that these funds may not be used by the Government, whose faith and credit are pledged to repay them, save and except when a foreign invader comes with an armed host to assail our flag or our territory. The funds under no possible circumstance could be used to protect the credit of the United States.

Mr. President, some of the greatest and most enduring reputations ever made in this Chamber are traceable to the splendid efforts of our predecessors here to build up and sustain the credit of the United States Government. For more than twenty years I have been privileged to address my fellow-citizens in States extending from ocean to ocean on public questions, and whether audiences have been composed of Democrats, or Republicans, or Populists, I have never known an audience of the plain people to refuse to respond in a hearty round of applause to a compliment paid to the unmatched and unmatchable credit of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Montana yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. From what can the Senator anticipate that the credit of the Government of the United States in time of peace would be in danger?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from New York well described, and in better terms than I can command, an exigency which might well arise in consequence of the operations of this identical bill if enacted into law.

But, Mr. President, let us strip this question of all present subterfuges. The apprehension is that if this amendment, as presented by the Senator from Utah, is adopted, these funds will be used to relieve the banks of the 2 per cent bonds and permit them to buy Panama threes and substitute them as a basis for circulation. Is not that the milk in the cocoanut? Is not that the basis of the apprehension? Is not that the ground of all the innuendo and suspicion connected with this matter?

Mr. President, I aver and I make the averment without any fear of contradiction at the hands of any Senator, that under the operations of this bill the board of trustees could not, without a violation of the law itself and of their sacred trust under it, invest in 2 per cent bonds of the United States so long as there was available a security at a higher rate of interest.

Yesterday, Mr. President, we adopted a provision which prescribes the conditions under which these funds may be loaned, and I challenge the attention of Senators to that provision. In fixing the rate at which the money is to be deposited in the banks the board of trustees shall take into account: First, the amount to be paid to the depositor, 2 per cent per annum; second, the expenses of administration; third, charges and possible losses; and in no event shall the money be loaned at less than 2¼ per cent.

In the presence of that section of the law, does any Senator pretend to say that the officers of the Government who will be trustees under the law can, without violating both the law and the trust, go to the relief of any bank by picking up a 2 per cent bond. No, Mr. President, that apprehension, if honestly entertained by any Senator, is a groundless apprehension, unless upon the assumption that the trustees will violate their trust.

The seriousness of the situation commands us all to be candid. The situation to-day is that the Panama Canal expenses of the Government from day to day and from week to week and from month to month are being paid out of the current receipts of the Government of the United States. Why? Because, I assume, that if Panama bonds were thrown upon the market, they would quickly be substituted for 2 per cent bonds as a basis of circulation, and the 2 per cent bonds would go below par.

Now, Mr. President, I have never owned a 2 per cent bond, and my constituents are not bond holders to any extent, but I venture to say that there is not a man, woman, or child in the State I represent who would not view with most distressed feelings the approach of a day when any security of the United States Government would drop below par. I care not who the holder may be, the obligation is the obligation of the United States, and God grant that none of us may live to see the day when a government obligation will be one farthing below par. In the desire of the President to maintain the credit of this Government I deeply sympathize. He shows a profound regard for the high duty of his office and the honor of his country.

But to return, if these funds were available, or some part of them, the Panama bonds would be taken over by the trustees and would draw 3 per cent. It would be better for the fund than the banks' interest.

But, Mr. President, Senators will say this will strip the country districts of their little loose change. We have been contending here—and I for one in good faith at least—that these funds will be chiefly made up of money now in hiding, not in banks or in the channels of trade at all. I believe that 90 per cent of the money that will go into the post-offices will be money that never has found its way into a bank, and will not find its way into the channels of trade at all unless by and through the agency of such an institution as this. So we are stripping no community, if our theory in that respect be correct.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Montana that while these funds which are in hiding are not in active circulation, they constitute a very important currency reserve for the communities in which they rest, and therefore are available in times of any stress or urgent demand to supply the needs of the people of that community.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I remember seeing 1,200 head of good horses sold for $1,800 on the street in a Montana town, and there was undoubtedly a million dollars in hiding in that town at that time.

Mr. OWEN. Were they wooden horses?

Mr. CARTER. In time of panic the kind of money the Senator refers to is held more tightly than at any other time. The person who is afraid of shadows is not likely to be courageous in a storm.

But, Mr. President, the assumption is that all of this money will be taken out of the local banks. In other words, we are proceeding with this amendment upon the theory that the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney-General, and the Postmaster-General will be likely to form a combination to emasculate and ruin the country. Those officers are as likely to be solicitous for the welfare of this country as the Senators from the respective States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the speech made by the President of the United States in New York, in which, only a few days ago, he declared the need for this very money to be invested in this way; and therefore, in his opinion, he being the referee, the exigency already exists and has been declared by him.

Mr. CARTER. With reference to that, let me say that the observations of the President of the United States in New York related generally to the situation to which I have very briefly referred. If the 3 per cent Panama bonds are thrown upon the market so as to liberate the 2 per cent bonds now held as security for circulation, of course the crisis will be at hand. But I do hope that the 3 per cent bonds of Panama may be taken care of by the money of the people, not of the banks, so as to leave the 2 per cents where they are doing duty until some scheme of funding entirely apart from this may be devised.

But, Mr. President, to return, it is assumed that at least three executive officers would enter into a conspiracy with the President of the United States to bring panic and disaster upon the respective communities of this our common country. Is that a tenable apprehension? Is that founded upon any fact in past history or any present estimate of character? If it be, Mr. President, then this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people has ceased to perform its functions in respect to the people as they should be performed; it is a failure, in other words.

I have no patience with the consideration of any measure upon a theory which assumes dishonesty in the officers of the Government under which we live. These funds, if invested in bonds for Panama construction or in the irrigation or reclamation certificates referred to, would not all be drawn from one State. What President or board would think of doing that? They would be drawn ratably, a certain percentage from each of the communities, and these percentages would flow not into the centers, in New York and elsewhere, as suggested, but they would flow into the securities of the Government of the United States. Mark you, if you will take a poll among the plain people of any community in this country you will find that ten to one, yea, ninety-nine out of a hundred will say, "Give us the security of a United States bond."

In case of financial trouble the matter would operate much as suggested by the Senator from New York. Government money to the extent of $500,000,000, the Senator says. There would be one thousand million dollars of this money inside of ten years. There would be a billion dollars in the postal savings depositories of the United States by 1920.

This large sum scattered out through 22,000 banks might be very difficult to reach in case a pinch from any point resulted in the rapid withdrawal of large funds. Fear would well be born of the weakness of the situation, and there ought to be some place where a security would be reached on which the actual cash could be procured at any time without distressing the country or the local banks, when at the time perchance it would be inexpedient or unwise to withdraw funds from them.

But, Mr. President, it is a practical question with which we are called upon to deal here to-day. The insertion of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will probably defeat this bill if inserted, and therefore the person who wants to defeat it will vote for the amendment.

I, Mr. President, for one believe that a postal savings system in this country would be a public and a perpetual benefaction to the people. I think that sacrifices of opinion should be made here and there with reference to the manner of using the assembled dollars of the people. I believe with other Senators in leaving these dollars in the communities where they are collected; but if the credit of my country calls them, I know the men behind the dollars would shoulder their guns as well as send forward their dollars to brace up the credit of this country.

War is not the most thoroughly unmixed evil to be encountered by nations. A prostrate credit, a condition which brings panic and disaster, is as wasteful and distressing as war itself. It brings ruin to homes and distress to minds quite as successfully as war, without the consoling thought of heroic character developed in the people in connection with the transaction.

We are now at a point where this bill is to be passed or defeated. Any Senator who hopes to see a postal savings-bank bill placed upon the statute books of the United States will vote down this amendment, unless he feels that the maintenance of the credit of the United States is so forbidding as to constrain him to forego his just and proper desire for a postal savings system.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this measure at great length, but in view of the very extraordinary statement made by the Senator from Montana and in view of the further fact that we propose to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Utah, I wish the reasons why I do so to go into the RECORD.

The statement of the Senator from Montana that those who desire to defeat this bill are the people who are advocating the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, I think can not be borne out upon any state of facts which will be acceptable to a reasonable and dispassionate view of the situation. Those who have been advocating a postal savings-bank measure long before some of those who are so earnest to-day in its support are those who are in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and, notwithstanding the fact that they are advocating this amendment, they still believe that they are earnestly and in good faith supporting this measure.

Mr. President, in the very brief remarks which I propose to make I am going to pass by any challenge of any government officer's integrity or of his carrying into effect this law in accordance with principles which might be questioned by any citizen of the country. It is not necessary to base our argument upon any such position. But, upon the other hand, we will not, I apprehend, be swung from our feet, as it were, by statements to the effect that our position is calculated to challenge the integrity of the administration or the great value of the bill itself.

Mr. President, when did it become necessary to insert the amendment of the Senator from New York or the amendment of the Senator from Utah in this bill in order to make it a valid and a constitutional measure? These measures have been in one way or the other before the country and before Congress for a number of years. They have been advocated upon the theory that it was a means which we could adopt to encourage industry, thrift, and frugality among those not calculated to take care of their earnings, and to protect themselves in the great industrial struggle for existence.

We have been advocating this measure, many of us with some considerable doubt as to its constitutionality, because we believe in the great underlying principle and policy upon which the measure is based, and that is, that there were a vast number of people in this country who were unwilling to trust the banks, who were not in the habit of saving, who were not actuated as they should be at all times by the principle of thrift, who would put their money in the possession of the Government.

As was said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] the other day, that is the argument which has been advanced by the President preceding the present President and by the party of which I am an humble member in all instances where this bill has been advocated.

To-day we have swung away entirely from this underlying and controlling principle and are almost swung off of our feet here by the great appeal which is being made to protect the credit of the United States. We are led to believe here by unusual eloquence that we are upon the verge of war, or, secondly, that the time may shortly come when the credit of the United States will have no other foundation than the dimes which may be gathered from the poor of this country. An appeal is made to us to support this measure, not because we are serving the poor, not because we are providing means and methods by which they can practice thrift and learn industry and cultivate success, but, forsooth, that the bonds of the Government and the credit of the Government of the United States may be amply protected.

I have wondered as I listened to the exceptional presentation of this matter what would become of the credit of the United States in time of war if this measure should fail, or who would take care of the credit of the country if we could not gather up the dimes of the poor people to protect it. Do the Senators who are seriously arguing that proposition insist that in time of such emergency the banks of this country would falter; that the men who carry on the great enterprises of this country would falter? Does any Senator seriously believe that whatever the emergency might be or the crisis presented there would be any difficulty to raise all the money that was desired to purchase the bonds of the United States?

But it is insisted that this amendment of the Senator from Utah is also necessary for the purpose of putting into the bill a principle which will make it constitutional and that is a public use and public benefit; that it is necessary to have something of that kind interwoven into the bill in order to make it pass the test. If that were an argument which had to be met, I would direct the Senator from New York and the Senator from Montana to read the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Can there be any doubt of the proposition that the amendment as submitted by the Senator from Iowa covers every legal proposition which has been raised against this measure upon the theory that a public use is not served by the bill? Are not the exigencies of war provided for in the amendment which we propose? Is not the credit of the United States provided for in the amendment which we propose?

The arguments which have been presented as to the constitutionality of the measure or its unconstitutionality are answered in every particular phase and in every way by the amendment which is suggested and proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason why we should not permit ourselves to believe that the constitutionality of the measure depends upon any one of these amendments. If we can, under the authority of the Constitution, mark monuments where have fallen the brave in defense of the country for the purpose of teaching patriotism, to inspire love of country, is there any possible doubt but what we can compel a postmaster, the servant of an institution already constitutionally created, to receive money for the purpose of encouraging thrift and industry and success among the citizens of the United States?

I am frank to say, Mr. President, that if I were examining this bill with the Constitution alone before me, I would have very grave doubts as to its constitutionality; but when you examine the bill in the light of the Constitution and the construction which has been placed upon certain provisions of that instrument, and the announcement of the court with reference to the principles which shall control it, there can be no possible doubt but what this measure will pass the criticism of the constitutional lawyer who opposes it in the Supreme Court. I say that if you can encourage patriotism and love of country by the power of condemnation, you may subject the instrumentality of the post-office so as to serve the needs and necessities of the people.

No one has said yet as to why the measure will be made constitutional by the amendment, whereas it would not be if it were not adopted. I am perfectly aware that the Senator from New York stated that, in his opinion, it would not be constitutional. But unfortunately we were not given the details of the argument or the reasoning by which he reached that conclusion. The Senator from Montana says that it was for the purpose of giving a public use to the money which was being collected, but, as I have suggested, that is answered by the amendment itself. It covers the subject. It is conclusive upon the matter if it needs to be met at all.

Now, Mr. President, suppose that we should have a threatened panic, with this measure formed as it would be when the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah should be adopted.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CARTER. If it would not inconvenience the Senator, I should like to make an observation to him at this point.

I entertain the view expressed by the Senator that if the constitutionality of this measure depended upon the amendment, the proposal of the Senator from Iowa would present a hook upon which the measure could be hung. But that, however, does not meet the point which we have been compelled to consider in the effort to secure the passage of the bill. We are dealing, in my point of view, with the parliamentary rather than the constitutional situation.

The Senator from Idaho will recall the lucid statement of the Senator from New York with reference to some kind of a reserve which would protect the credit of the United States in the midst of this stupendous financial operation. We have been negotiating, as the Senator well knows, endeavoring to clear the way for this bill through the rocky channel which we have encountered from the very beginning.

The word "reserve" was stricken out yesterday, and that was a shocking thing to many of those who are supporting the bill with many misgivings and come forward to-day with another amendment denying to the Government of the United States the right in any exigency to protect its credit in connection with the operation of the bill. The difficulty which the Senator well understands will be multiplied and developed into an insurmountable obstacle right before our eyes in this Chamber.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Montana answers itself. If those who deposit this money are called upon to meet the exigency suggested by the Senator from Montana, they would meet it with the same patriotism and the same fervor that they would meet an exigency of war itself. You can not convince me that the credit of the United States would be involved unless the Government could take the dimes and the quarters collected from the poor in order to protect the credit, when at the same time that money was in a position where the men who would have it under their control would have a right to use it for the same purpose for which this board could use it if it should have the power to draw it out.

In other words, it is not a question of the credit of the Government, it is not a question of war, but it is a question of what shall be done with this money in times of peace, to protect not those who deposited it, but to satisfy those who are engaged in manipulation with other securities of which they have not at the present time perhaps any considerable need.

Suppose, I was going to say, that the condition which is pictured by the Senator from New York should arise and a panic should be threatened, we would have this condition: The tendency of all the people would be to withdraw their money from the banks. It would be the tendency of the bank depositors, and that has been made a strong argument against this bill, to withdraw their money and put it in the hands of the Government.

The second condition which we would have would be that swinging above every bank of the country would be this Damocles sword of the possibility of the Government withdrawing these deposits from the banks at the same time.

You would have, therefore, Mr. President, an attack upon the banks by the depositors, and you would have the knowledge in the minds of the depositors that it was within the power of the Government at the same time to wreck the banks. If a trap could be devised and a scheme planned which would shock every financial institution in this country in time of panic, it would be the possibility of the people withdrawing upon one side and the knowledge of the possibility upon the part of the depositors that the Government might withdraw upon the other side. There are a great many——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Idaho yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not think it would be a fair and fitting climax to that policy which to-day places this great Government in the alternative of legislation or of financial distress?

Mr. BORAH. I think, Mr. President, that with a few more statutes drawn upon the principle upon which we are proceeding with financial legislation in these days, the time will not be far distant when half a dozen banks in New York City will be able to create a stringency at any time on ten days' notice because they wish to have it for any purpose which they may desire. This, instead of staying the credit of the country, instead of staying the credit of the Government, would be inclined to undermine it and destroy it. If the Government should withdraw money for the purpose of using it in any way, it would be a constant threat to the solvency of every bank which would take the deposit under the postal savings law. The result would be that the banks, as a general rule, would not accept this money. There are a great many banks in the country to-day that will not accept state funds, public funds, unless there are stated periods only when the funds can be withdrawn.

Very many of the best banks of the country will not accept state funds when they may be withdrawn at any moment's notice, because they know from experience and from observation that the very moment the discussion of the solvency of that bank takes place upon the street the second suggestion is that the Government or the State is going to withdraw its funds. In this instance, if this amendment should be adopted, there would be the constant threat against the banks of the country that the funds could be withdrawn at the ipse dixit of the board.

Mr. President, we believe that it is vital to the success of this measure that the money collected be kept in the community where it is collected. We believe it vital for the reason that that money should be there to develop the industries of the country, to afford employment, to afford wages to those who are at the same time depositing. We can not imagine any condition more undesirable than that of the withdrawing of this money in time of panic, taking it to centers, and leaving the outlying communities wholly unprotected with funds with which to transact business.

We had experience in 1907 which leads us to believe that if any law can be passed which will hold money in the communities where it is earned, where it belongs, that that law is necessary and essential to the stable business and industrial affairs of this country. We are opposing the amendment, not because we are opposed to the measure, but because we believe that without this principle the measure itself would be used for a purpose not originally designed and never understood by the American people.

No feature of this discussion which has taken place within the last forty-eight hours was ever submitted to the voters of this country as the reason for the enactment of this legislation. It has never been understood that there was any necessity in this way and by this kind of a measure to protect the credit of the country. If the measure can not be passed with the view of serving those whom it was intended to serve, let those who in this Chamber want to direct its course in another direction take the responsibility of defeating the measure.

If the Constitution has been so framed that this measure must be along certain lines and to serve certain interests, let us know that also, and those who interpret the Constitution in that light may also assume that responsibility.

Before resuming my seat I want to read again the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa:

Provided, That in time of war, if, in the judgment of the President, an exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Now, I want to hear the constitutional lawyer who will assert upon the floor of the Senate that this amendment does not cover every legal objection which has been made to this bill—I mean so far as these amendments are concerned. I want to hear in what respect this amendment does not cover the emergency which was supposed to exist as a constitutional proposition.

It is not sufficient in the face of this measure to satisfy the Senate of the United States to say that I do not believe it to be sufficient. It is not sufficient to say that, without the amendment as submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], the bill is unconstitutional, and then to add upon the top of that that those who can not accept it intend to defeat the measure as a whole. With that profound respect with which we listen to such authorities upon constitutional law we still desire to know what public use or public interest is not served by the amendment, as proposed by the Senator from Iowa, which is served by the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. We have, therefore, with the constitutional question out of it, the other proposition, which is the real purpose of putting this amendment into the bill—we have the real object. Nobody upon this floor believes for a moment, and nobody accepts, the doctrine that it is necessary to have a postal savings bank in order to protect the credit of the United States; and no one believes, whether we protect it by this bill or not, that we have not other and sufficient and efficient means by which to protect it.

We may reason ourselves into the belief that the measure lacks constitutional authority, but we do not think for a moment seriously that the credit of the United States depends in any respect upon any provision which is found in this bill. The emergencies which have been suggested might possibly arise, but, if they should arise, there would not be any more difficulty in selling bonds of the United States Government until the enemy of the country were in possession of the Capitol, than there would be to induce a man to take $20 gold pieces when you should hand them out to him.

There is not any more danger of the credit of the United States being impaired by any possible conditions which have been foreshadowed than there is that this ignis fatuus upon the eastern sky will finally ripen into a deluge of war; there is not any more danger of the bankers and the depositors of this country refusing to accept the bonds of the Government than there is that the gold upon which the stamp of the United States is found will cease to circulate.

The argument of these Senators answers itself. Our untold millions, our imprisoned wealth, our undeveloped resources, our patriotism, are all put aside this morning, and it seems we have but one thing to protect the credit of the United States, and that is the dimes and pennies which are picked up from men who are unfamiliar with our institutions and are unwilling to trust our banks. Will Senators seriously argue that those who are opposing this amendment are not in favor of sustaining the credit of the United States because they do not so lightly regard that credit as to assume that it has no other basis nor substantial foundation than that of the support of the poor?

I have never heard such a complete, such a marvelous, such a remarkable impeachment of the business men of this country, its banks, its wealth, its successful citizens, as has been showered upon us in an effort to write into this bill something which is derelict to the purpose for which it was organized, formulated, and proposed. We are appealed to upon the theory that the administration is involved, that the credit of the Government is involved.

Men will not seriously believe as they read these reports that we have turned aside from the object and purpose which originally actuated us in the formation of this bill to a serious discussion of how we shall protect ourselves and the credit of the Government. They will suspect, as others suspect, that while that is the argument, that while that is the logic sought to be used, the real purpose and object is stated candidly and fairly by the great President of the United States in his speech in New York a few nights ago. If the same candor were used here in the presentation of it that was used by the President, there would be no doubt in my mind as to what would become of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. It would be adopted, and the measure would go through. The President stated why he desired it. He stated it with the candor which always characterizes him in discussion, with a clearness with which he always presents his views of public subjects; and whether you agree with him or not, you respect the great candor of the man in the presentation of his cause.

The fact that we are unable to bring ourselves to believe that that is necessary is neither a challenge to the judgment nor the integrity nor the high purpose and patriotism of the Chief Magistrate of the country, nor is it an admission upon our part that we are desirous of defeating this measure for trivial or unimportant reasons; but it is what we are all entitled to have, an honest difference of opinion between men who have to deal with great and important subjects upon which they must bring to bear alone their conscience and their judgment, permitting no man to dictate wherein they shall use the one or refuse to use the other. When men take their position in the discharge of a public duty and carry with them into their service a conviction, it belongs to no man to impeach them because he does not happen to agree with the views of another equally as honest in his objects and purposes in life. We are here to discharge our duty as we understand it; and I say to the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that it ill becomes the leader of this measure upon this floor to assert that those who have striven to make it a successful measure have entered into a conspiracy to defeat it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. CARTER. Before the question is propounded——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAPP. I will yield to the Senator from Montana, as my question applies to him.

Mr. CARTER. The word "conspiracy" has been widely bandied through the country of recent years, but it was far from my purpose to assign to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and those believing with him, anything in the nature of a conspiracy to defeat this bill. I took occasion to say that the effect would be to defeat the bill under certain circumstances, which possibly might be avoided by later action of the Senate, but the present parliamentary situation is the one to which I referred.

I accord to every Senator as freely as does the Senator from Idaho the right, which he possesses without my accord, to exercise his judgment and to express his views on any subject of pending legislation without criticism or anathema hurled by me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am glad to have that interpretation of the Senator's views as expressed a while ago, because it was certainly understood by those who listened to his remarks, spoken with the energy and the vehemence with which he uttered them, that there was not a good motive behind those who were supporting this amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think, upon looking over the RECORD, the Senator will find that I spoke of effects and not motives.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that being true, what are the differences here with reference to this proposed amendment? First, the constitutional question is answered by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. It may be a more remote contingency, but it answers that proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a hook.

Mr. BORAH. It is a hook, as suggested by the Senator from Texas, and while the hook might not be placed in position as quickly as a financial crisis would place it there, yet, so far as the constitutional proposition is concerned, that is answered.

Mr. BAILEY. Nothing but hooks have been proposed.

Mr. BORAH. That being true, Mr. President, then there is this controversy between us here and nothing more. We have a constitutional measure, assuming that that makes it so, which I am going to assume for the sake of the argument. Then, the difference arises over the question whether or not this money shall be kept in the localities where it is collected; whether or not it shall be within the power of anyone to put it away from the development of the localities where the money is earned and where it belongs. That being true, Mr. President, I feel perfectly free to insist upon the amendment becoming a part of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, as I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I propose to trespass upon the patience of the Senate long enough to put what, to my mind, constitutes my reason for advocating that amendment and opposing the second and last amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in the form in which he presented it. But, before doing that, I want to make this suggestion: If this country has reached that financial crisis described by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], I think the time has about come when some amateurs should take hold of the helm. I regard it, sir, as a confession of weakness beyond parallel made in this Chamber that a great country like ours, in a time of profound peace, with no great burden save the usual burdens of government and the additional burden of the Panama Canal, has got to that point where we must go to the women and the children and to those who put their savings in the post-office orders of this country and are expected to put their savings in the proposed postal savings banks to rescue the credit of this great Nation. Again, I say if that be a true picture, the time has come when there should be some change in the legislation of this Republic.

It is a strange situation that confronts us to-day. We began a few years ago with a plain proposition for a postal savings-bank bill. That proposition was written into the tentative legislation of our last session, and some of those of us who were called upon to advocate the policies of our party, under situations adverse or favorable, as the case might be, explained to the people of our States that that promise meant what it said in the light of the then tentative policy as outlined by the bill then pending in this body; and I want to warn my party associates that there will come a time when excuses will not be taken by the people for the broken faith of party pledges.

The people understood from that bill and from the men who advocated that measure—and they advocated it, let me say, as an offset to the Democratic proposition of the guaranty of bank deposits—that that measure meant that this money should be taken in the communities where it was deposited and used in those communities, to leave those communities only as it might leave under commercial conditions. The people understood that; we discussed that; and we presented that to them; and this measure came in at this session with this new plan of a bond scheme of some sort.

The committee withdrew that plan, and I want to say to the chairman of the committee to-day that if in opposing this second proposition of the Senator from Utah we are opposing the maintenance of the credit of this Nation, then what was the attitude of that committee when they brought in a bill without a suggestion of this character in the bill itself?

But suddenly we discover a change of front; and it requires something of an acrobat to keep up with the changes that have taken place in the conduct of this bill with reference to its terms and conditions. We found, first, the proposition to put this money into bonds and other government securities; and I want to say here that a more subtle scheme was never devised for taking the earnings of the people in the remote sections of this country and putting them where they could be used in the great financial centers without a corresponding community asset in the shape of the obligation to return that money. When the money of one section goes to another section in ordinary commercial transactions, it is accompanied with a corresponding obligation to return it, which obligation may be used by the banks as a community asset.

Take a thousand men in the city, we will say, of Indianapolis, and let each one put $100 into the post-office, and let that $100 be sent East to buy bonds or to be invested there in any form, while it is true there would be a thousand men in Indianapolis individually holding the obligation of the Government to return the money when demanded, it is an obligation which they will not invoke at the very time when that community needs that money most; but if that money has gone into the banks of Indianapolis and by those banks finds in commercial exigencies a resting place in the East, there is the corresponding obligation to return it to those banks which they can use as a community asset in times of financial needs in that community. A more subtle plan to shift that currency without that returning community asset could not be devised. It was promptly repudiated, I believe, by the overwhelming sentiment of this Senate.

Then came the proposition of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT.] I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Under his plan is it proposed to put this money into existing bonds or into future issues of bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no provision made in the amendment offered by me as to whether the money shall be invested in existing bonds or whether it may be invested in bonds hereafter to be issued.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it a fair deduction from the Senator's amendment to say that the money may be used in future issues of bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that would be entirely left in the hands of the trustees under the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Then it is a fair deduction.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the present 2 per cent bonds, if the Senator refers to them——

Mr. CLAPP. They are outstanding bonds to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. They are outstanding bonds to-day, but, Mr. President, under the provisions of the bill it would be impossible to invest in the 2 per cent bonds unless they dropped below par.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. Well, now we have got one proposition before the Senate, and that is that it is proposed to take this money and issue bonds, turn the bonds over to trustees, take from the fund the amount of the bonds, and the bonds remain theoretically with this fund, taking the place of the money which goes into their purchase.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that perhaps could be the construction placed upon the amendment, but before that could be done the credit of the Government must be assailed.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. And it must also be in time of war.

Mr. CLAPP. Not necessarily in time of war under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. In either exigency.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well. Then we have got this concrete proposition that, if an exigency exists, the Government may go through the form of issuing a bond, signing the bond itself, putting it into one pocket of the Government and taking the money out of that pocket and putting it into the other pocket.

Mr. SMOOT. That would not, Mr. President, in my judgment, be the transaction at all. The money deposited by the citizen is put in the banks located in the State.

Mr. CLAPP. And held there by the United States Government.

Mr. SMOOT. The United States Government is responsible for it, but it is held by the bank.

Mr. CLAPP. The Government is the depositor.

Mr. SMOOT. The Government is the depositor. They are responsible for that money. The money is held in the bank for the Government, and if the exigency arises, as provided in the amendment, then, if the President so decides, the board of trustees can take the money and purchase United States bonds.

Mr. CLAPP. What bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. Government bonds are the only bonds we are discussing.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly. That is, the bonds would stand theoretically in the place of the money taken from that fund, would they not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Government would have the money just the same as if it sold the bonds to anybody else.

Mr. CLAPP. Who would hold the bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. The bonds would be held by the trustees until redeemed.

Mr. CLAPP. In other words, Mr. President, the proposition is that when this money is to be used for an exigency, the Government will issue a bond, buy the bond itself, take the money, and use the money. If that has got to be the case, then I say let us put an amendment in this bill providing that whenever the appropriations exceed the amount of money in the Federal Treasury the Secretary of the Treasury may certify that fact and this fund be used, to be replaced by an appropriation at the next session; in other words, Mr. President, let us at this session enact one bill into law that the average American citizen can read and tell just what it means. It might be a surprise to the American people, but I would be in favor of treating the American public to at least one surprise of that kind.

Here we are discussing to-day what can be done and what can not be done under this proposed measure. Let us agree what we will do. If we propose to carry the policy of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] into effect, let us say so in his own plain, blunt terms. If we propose, on the other hand, to take this money from time to time, as the exigencies of the Government may require, and use that money, retaining our responsibility to the depositor to pay the deposit whenever it is demanded, whenever asked for, let us write that into this bill, and get rid of this idea of a bond which has been born, bred, and developed since the promise to make this law was given to the American people.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. CARTER addressed the Chair.

Mr. CLAPP. Let us for once pass a bill which will not require half a dozen astute lawyers to tell what it means when it becomes a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to ask the Senator if his suggestion that the money could be used in this way to meet the current expenses of Government is not exactly the system that prevails in Great Britain, where all the money deposited in the savings post-offices goes into the general fund?

Mr. CLAPP. It is, and it is a system that has drained Great Britain and impoverished Ireland——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. And by the munificence of the sum to be appropriated has brought Great Britain to the verge of financial ruin.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator did not quite understand me.

Mr. CLAPP. I think I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked the Senator if his suggestion was to follow out the custom of Great Britain?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir; practically, with the same effect; that is, if at all, let us do it direct, I would say, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, knowing well the desire of the Senator from Minnesota to be accurate in his statements on the floor, I call his attention to the opening remarks made by him to the effect that when the respective parties declared in favor of a system of postal savings banks in the national conventions in 1908, they had in mind a bill then pending in this body, which was plain and specific in its terms and not to be misunderstood, and that that bill made no reference to bonded investments.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not say they made no reference. I said that the plan of that bill, as drawn and presented to the people, was to retain the money in the communities where it was deposited, subject to commercial disbursement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That was the argument in the campaign.

Mr. CARTER. So does the present bill, save and except as to the extent that provision is made for the purchase of bonds. The bill which was at that time before the committee and in the Senate was Senate bill 6484, and section 11 of that bill, after providing for the deposit of these funds in the national banks in the respective communities, made this general provision:

> Where it is not practicable to deposit such funds in the counties, States, or Territories where they are received, they may be deposited in banks elsewhere or invested in state, territory, county, or municipal bonds, to be selected by the Postmaster-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill before the Senate as reported by the committee has in that relation this provision:

> If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, etc., and invested in United States bonds or bonds approved for savings-bank investment in the respective States.

Where the State has no prescribed rule, then under the rules of either New York or California.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I submit that that is in no manner a criticism upon what I have said with reference to the pending amendment. Of course this law or any other law would have to provide that if the money would not be received by the banks of the State, it should be put somewhere else; and if the banks would not take it, it would have to be put in securities. But this amendment of the Senator from Utah proposes to take the money, where the banks are willing to take it and actually have it on deposit, where they have got it, and upon the plea of the public credit take it out and invest it in the bonds of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. In certain cases.

Mr. CLAPP. It does not matter what the cases are. When you say the exigencies of the case, there is no limitation left.

One word with reference to the effect of this upon the credit of the Government.

I undertake to say that a plain, simple law would be much better. I think this is top-heavy. I would have no trustees. I would take the present machinery for the conduct of the business of the Post-Office Department, under which at present people invest in money orders for safety, and simply enlarge it to the extent of giving a man instead of a money-order certificate of deposit a pass book, under a law which would entitle him to a certain rate of interest, and then deposit that money in a bank with adequate security under a contract which would give the Government a certain rate of interest. Then, when the man wants his money, let him go to the postmaster, who has a record of his credit, and get a check to complete the transaction, as it is to-day in the case of state, county, city, and school district deposits. It requires no top-heavy bill here with a board of trustees. But it seems essential, to meet conditions, that there should be some such board as that created.

The effect of this bill, if it becomes a law, would be to take money from three sources. It would to-day take the money, and we do not know how much, that is put into the post-offices under the post-office money-order system for safe-keeping—and the necessity for it must be apparent when the poor miners of this country, as they do in my own State, are willing to pay something to the United States Government for taking care of their hard-earned savings—it would take the money of the small depositor, who is always a menace to the bank in time of trouble; and it would take the hidden money, and no one knows how much; and the money from those three sources would go into the banks, with the United States as the depositor. There would no longer be a line of timid depositors thronging the window of the bank; no longer a lot of panic-stricken people crushing one another as at the door of a theater, as described by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. But with those three funds together, deposited by the Government in the bank, I venture to say that no well-organized bank would ever have or could have any difficulty or fear of panic under those conditions.

We have to-day a Monetary Commission that is traveling over the world trying to devise some system for improving and steadying our banking system, and I undertake to say that the money in this country which from these three sources would go into the banks, with the Government as the depositor instead of the timid depositor of to-day, would do more to establish a sound, safe, sane, and practicable banking system in this country than any recommendation that will come from any monetary commission.

If you want the credit of this country preserved, if you want the credit of this country maintained, put it upon that sound basis, putting this money in banks in the communities where it belongs; let it find its outlet as it may under commercial conditions, bringing back to those communities a community asset in the form of obligations which return as the money goes out, and you will have a banking system strengthened as no legislation ever offered in this Congress would strengthen the banking system of this country.

If the statement of the Senator from Montana is true that this great country is in the face of the condition which he portrays, I want to suggest that the time has come when somebody should take hold of legislation here and do something of plain and practical nature.

Mr. President, one word more. I regret the fact that it seems as though a few of us must either go against legislation or else be charged as hostile to legislation. I know of no authority empowered to dictate to Members of the Senate what shall be the test of legislation except their own judgment and their own conviction and, politically, their party platforms. I am as ready to yield along lines which do not involve principle as anyone else. Legislation must be something of give and take, but it can not involve the surrender of principle, and we have just as good a right to charge as being hostile to this measure the men who insist upon keeping in here this bond provision in some form—it seems it matters but little, so long as it is left in with the word "bond"—as they have to charge us with hostility to the bill because we insist that it shall be kept out, save alone where other places for the money can not be found for its deposit under the law.

I desire to say again, Mr. President, that I believe it would be infinitely more satisfactory to the people of this country to adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York, which means what it says, and if it is only proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Utah to provide a species of bookkeeping for taking this money, if that must be the plan, then let us write into this bill the plain provision for that plan, so that every man, woman, and child can understand—that we can take this money, that we do propose to take this money, whenever we need it, for public purposes—and for once give the American public a law which they can read and understand.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I was somewhat surprised at the speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. I have served with him on the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for ten years. I was a member of the subcommittee that prepared the bill reported to the Senate last session in favor of the postal savings bank.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana has ever at any time declared in favor of taking this money and investing it in government bonds previous to to-day, when he declared in favor of the Smoot amendment, I have never heard of it, and I declare here now, and I do not believe it can be successfully contradicted, that when this legislation was originally prepared by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and unanimously reported, all of the discussion led to the fact that this money must be kept at home and deposited in the banks in the communities where it was originally deposited in the post-offices. This is the first time I have ever heard, either directly or indirectly, that the Senator from Montana had changed front in favor of taking this money away from home and investing it in government securities.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Upon reading the bill the Senator from Georgia will observe that provision was made, as the bill was reported unanimously by the committee, for investment in bonds of the United States or other securities such as the bill indicated.

Mr. CLAY. That was where it could not be loaned to the banks, and it was only to be in the last emergency. The Senator knows that every member of the subcommittee which prepared this bill and originally reported it was in favor of retaining this money at home, loaning it to the banks, and not bringing it to the centers.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana adhered to that view then and adheres to that view now. The Senator from Montana this morning asserted that a parliamentary situation had arisen which rendered it quite difficult, if not impossible, to pass this measure unless such provision was made as is included in this pending amendment for the protection of the credit of the United States in an exigency.

Mr. CLAY. I do not hesitate to say to the Senator from Montana that if it becomes necessary, in order to pass this bill, to shape it in such a way that the money must be invested in government bonds and taken away from the localities and brought to our central cities, then the bill ought to go down in defeat.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Georgia will clearly perceive that there is no provision in the amendment known as the "Smoot amendment" for taking the money from the local depositories, where the bill provides it shall be placed, unless in the event of war or some other exigency involving the credit of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Ah, Mr. President, I have respect for the amendment of the Senator from New York. He meets this issue in a manly and a courageous way, and states his position so that no man can misunderstand him. But when you take this amendment, commonly called the "Smoot amendment"—far be it from me to make any reflection upon my friend, the Senator from Utah—it is drawn in such a way as to give the President the right, when any emergency arises in which he thinks he ought to use it, to use the money for any purpose for which he may see proper. It leaves it to his discretion to say whether or not he shall do so, when an emergency arises, outside of the question of war.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Now, I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. CARTER. I desire the Senator to be accurate.

Mr. CLAY. Let me get through this proviso.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. It does not permit the President to use the money in any way he sees fit or to deposit it wheresoever he pleases, but in specific terms it requires that the money thus withdrawn for the protection of the credit of the United States shall be invested in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Let us see if the Senator is correct:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires.

Let us suppose that your receipts are not equal to your expenditures; suppose that your public-buildings bill carried more money than the Treasury had; suppose your river and harbor bill carried more money than the Treasury had, the President of the United States could immediately say that the credit of the United States was involved, and he could use this fund to meet such an emergency.

Mr. CARTER. For the purchase of bonds or other securities of the United States——

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. And not for anything else.

Mr. CLAY. And put the money in the Treasury.

I desire to call the Senator's attention to one fact. The present Secretary of the Navy was Postmaster-General when this bill was first introduced in the Senate. He came before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and advocated this measure; and the present Secretary of the Navy is a highly educated and very intelligent man. I have sent for the most excellent speech that he made in favor of the postal savings system, and he laid down the proposition to that committee that these postal funds were never to be mixed with the Treasury funds of the United States. They were to be kept separate and distinct, and were not to be used to pay the current expenses of the Government.

It was never intended by the original framers of this legislation that we should use this money to build harbors and public buildings and to pay for the army or navy. It was intended that this money should be loaned by the Government for the benefit of the depositors and never to pay the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Of course the Senator from Georgia does not wish to have the Senate understand that under any provision of this bill or proposed amendment the money of the postal savings fund could be used for the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. CLAY. Suppose there is deposited in the post-offices $600,000,000 of this money, and the Government takes it and invests it; issues bonds, invests this fund in United States bonds, and places the money arising from the sale of the bonds in the Treasury of the United States, does the Senator contend that because there is no provision in this bill for the use of this surplus sum lying in your Treasury provision will not be made to use it to meet the current expenses of the Government?

Mr. CARTER. Of course, if the board of trustees of the fund elected to purchase bonds of the United States, they would be compelled to pay the money for the bonds. The money would then belong to the United States, the borrower issuing bonds, and would no longer be in the fund.

Mr. CLAY. And could be used for any purpose?

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly.

Mr. CLAY. Whenever the Government of the United States sold the bonds and got the money and put it into the Treasury of the United States, the Government could use it for any purpose?

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly. There is no difficulty whatever about that. The money would then become the money of the United States, and the bonds would be the bonds of the postal fund.

Mr. CLAY. It was never the purpose of those who were in good faith in favor of this system that it should be organized for the purpose of investing in bonds and furnishing the Government of the United States with money. It was the original purpose to secure from certain people, who would not trust banks, their earnings, and keep them for them at a small rate of interest, and reloan the money for the benefit of this class of people; and the Postmaster-General urged this legislation because it would reach a certain class of foreigners who would not trust the banks. He produced the amount of the post-office orders, where foreigners had bought orders, and sent the money home to their own countries, and he insisted that if we put this system in operation hereafter these people, this class of foreigners, would trust our Government and deposit with the Government where they would not with the banks. That was the purpose of the bill, and the bill received the support of every member of the committee as originally intended. I do not believe if the amendment of my friend the Senator from Utah were adopted and this bill sent back to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, it could ever get a majority of that committee as now constituted.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Georgia has had a great deal of experience on appropriations committees. Does the Senator look upon this bill as an appropriation of money? In other words, does the Senator believe the President in case of war would have a right under this bill to sell these bonds and apply the money for war purposes?

Mr. CLAY. An act appropriating this same fund for war purposes would have to be passed by Congress.

Mr. RAYNER. I know we could not pass it. That is the reason I asked the Senator whether he thinks this amendment——

Mr. CLAY. I think it would require action upon the part of Congress.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether he thinks the amendment of the Senator from Utah would have the effect of doing what we have not any constitutional right to do? That is the question I want to ask the Senator.

Mr. CLAY. That question is worthy of the attention of the Senate.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator think—and I ask him because he has had large experience in such matters—that in case of war the President could sell these bonds and use the money for war purposes? What is the opinion of the Senator on that point?

Mr. CLAY. I think the amendment is intended to give the President that power—but clearly to my mind Congress would have to appropriate the money before it could be used.

Mr. RAYNER. Then it is absolutely unconstitutional, looked upon in that light, because the Constitution says that we have the right "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." If one comes to the conclusion that this is an appropriation bill, and if the conclusion of the Senator from Georgia is carried to its logical conclusion, then the amendment itself is a violation of the Constitution. I give no opinion on that subject.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. I shall occupy the floor for only a few minutes longer.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to make a statement in reply to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Montana will understand that I give no opinion on that point. But the Senator from Georgia argued it in a way that would indicate that in case of war the President would have the right to sell the bonds and use the money. If that is true, then we all admit that the amendment violates the Constitution.

Mr. CARTER. This amendment does not, nor does any provision in the bill, provide for any appropriation of money or any infringement of the constitutional right and power of Congress to make appropriations. It provides merely for the investment by the trustees of certain funds under given circumstances.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question before he takes his seat, because I think I agree with him upon that subject. Then it requires future appropriations. This bill would require every time a future appropriation in order to use the money in the Treasury resulting from the sale of these bonds.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly. There is no invasion of the rights of Congress as to the appropriation of money.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAY. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to add to the statement made by the Senator from Montana the suggestion that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah does authorize the President, through the board of trustees, to withdraw the money from the banks in the case suggested and invest it in any bonds that have been authorized by Congress.

In the existing situation, as I understand, we have $700,000,000 of bonds outstanding held by the banks, and the amendment would authorize the investment of the proceeds in any of those bonds. We have already authorized—or, I assume will at this Congress, and have, so far as the Senate is concerned—the issuance of $30,000,000 more for irrigation purposes, and the amendment would authorize the investment of the funds in those bonds.

I assume that if bonds are issued in order to construct the Panama Canal or to finish it, the funds could be invested in those bonds. But, of course, the President himself would not use the fund save in the way pointed out in the bill; that is to say, he could not issue bonds that had not before that time been authorized by Congress.

Mr. CLAY. Beyond question when these bonds are sold and the money deposited in the Treasury of the United States it would take further action on the part of Congress before the money could be used for that purpose; in other words, it would have to be appropriated. But I do not care to discuss that feature of the question. I had something else in view.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator from Georgia passes to another branch of the discussion, I should like to make a suggestion.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understood the Senator to say that under the provisions of this amendment, in his judgment, the money might be withdrawn from the banks on the direction of the President and invested in bonds; for example, where Congress had appropriated a large sum of money for buildings and the current revenue was not sufficient to meet that expenditure.

I call his attention to the fact that the amendment does not provide for a withdrawal of money and its investment in bonds simply because the revenue of the country is not equal to its expenditures or simply because the credit of the United States is involved.

The credit of the United States must be involved by war or other contingency, and, according to every rule of construction, the other contingency must be of the same serious character as war. There can not be any question about the rule of statutory construction that when we state a particular thing, and follow that particular thing by general language, the general language is confined to things of the same class.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. For example, what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Wait a moment. So when we say that the money can be drawn when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires, we mean, and if the question could go to the court it undoubtedly would be construed to mean, where the exigency was war or an exigency of that same serious character. I do not mean a conflict of arms, but of that same general serious character, so the money could not be withdrawn, unless the language of the statute was perverted, in a simple case, where the expenditures of the country were exceeded by its revenues.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator says war or some exigency of like serious character. Now, name one exigency of like serious character.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not understand the question of the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said that the only true interpretation could be war or some exigency of like serious character. Name another exigency of like serious character.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No other such exigency occurs to me at the moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, why put it in?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Pardon me a moment.

Mr. CLAY. I want to get through, but I will hear the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think perhaps a contingency arose in 1893, when we were compelled to issue bonds at great loss.

Mr. CLAPP. Any contingency that went to the credit of the Government. It is war or it is anything that went to the credit as well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not because simply the current expenses at some given time exceeded the revenue.

Mr. CLAPP. Nobody claims that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A shortage in the current revenue does not necessarily involve the credit of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just one more question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the point I should like to make plain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said a contingency such as arose in 1893. I ask him if in such a contingency as that the Government should withdraw from the local banks all over the country the deposits derived from this fund, whether that would not impair the bank's ability to loan to merchants to carry on business, and if it would not create a greater condition for a fundamental panic than the contingency of using bonds in the first place?

I ask the Senator the question if in 1893, at the time of the panic to which the Senator refers, in addition to the situation, the Government could under the provision now contemplated and the instance which he cites take away from the local banks the money deposited there under this bill, thus reducing the ability of the local banks to loan to their local merchants from month to month to carry on their business, would not that in itself create the foundations for a panic which would be fundamental instead of temporary?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I do not——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A panic which would be a great deal worse.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think this authority, wisely exercised, would tend to check it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator thinks it would tend to check it if they took the money from the local banks which the local banks loaned to the local merchants by which the merchants carry on their business from time to time?

Mr. CLAY. As analyzed briefly, the amendment of the Senator from Utah provides:

That when, in the judgment of the President—

Now, mark you, in the judgment of the President—

war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Most assuredly the Government could issue bonds and hold these bonds as representing the postal deposits—equal to the amount of the bonds so held—and then the Government could say the depositors are secured by bonds. Now the postal deposits can be used to meet any emergency where the credit of the Government is involved. In other words, the President could say, "We have issued bonds to pay the postal depositors, and we can take the ready cash belonging to the depositors and use it to meet the urgent demands of the Government."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if such an exigency should arise as he has just portrayed, would it not be proper for the Government to have authority to withdraw the money they have on deposit?

Mr. CLAY. I do not believe, in time of profound peace, with our country rich in resources, an emergency ought to arise when the receipts of the Government are less than the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. And, Mr. President, I do not think it ever will arise.

Mr. CLAY. We ought not by any means to take money from the citizen deposited with the Government and use that money for the purpose of paying the current expenses of the Government. This system was not intended to swell the Treasury of the United States. It was intended that the Treasury of the United States should act as the agent for a certain class of unfortunate people in our country who would not trust the banks, in order to encourage economy and thrift among that class of people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to state to the Senator that the amendment does not contemplate nor does it provide that the money shall be taken from the banks for the purpose of running the current expenses of the Government. It does not so state. It is not so intended, and I do not see how such a construction could be placed upon it.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah occupies a peculiar position in the Senate. To my judgment it is almost without a parallel in the history of the Senate since I have been a member of the Senate. I do not speak in any disrespectful way of my distinguished friend from Utah. Less than ten days ago he offered this amendment on the floor of the Senate:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed, from time to time, by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Now, Mr. President, this is an amendment offered less than ten days ago by the Senator from Utah providing that these funds should be deposited in home banks, providing that the funds should be kept at home. The Senator was the most vehement advocate of that amendment. The Senator told the Senate and the country that this amendment ought to be adopted or the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLAY. I will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator it is true I offered the amendment he refers to, and it is also true that I am in full sympathy and accord with the desires of Senators here to keep the money in the communities in which it is deposited. I want to say that my amendment offered in place of the original amendment proposed by me some ten days or more ago is offered because of the fact that I have been convinced that with the provisions contained in the original amendment the bill would be rendered unconstitutional.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit a question right there? The Senator's new amendment, then, is offered in order to make it constitutional. Would that not be done fully as well from the point of view of its constitutionality if you included merely the word "war" and left out the words "or any other exigency?"

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it in my mind.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, if that is true, the Senator agrees to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had waited, I would have gone on and finished the other reasons that appealed to me for making the change.

It did seem to me, as a business man, rather a novel proposition, after considering the amendment more carefully, for the Government to be compelled to deposit the money in the banks with no provision whatever made for the withdrawal of the money from the banks; or, in other words, the money was placed in the banks and the Government was responsible for it, being the depositor, and it had no power to withdraw the money unless it was to pay the depositor or the interest upon the deposit or the expense of maintaining the system.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was the very purpose the Senator from Utah had in view.

Mr. SMOOT. I still have that in view now, only with the proviso that in case of war or when the credit of the Government is involved the President may have power to authorize the board of trustees to withdraw the money, not to put it into the Treasury of the United States, but to withdraw it and invest it in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the Senator advocated that amendment, and the amendment was adopted by the entire Senate. My understanding is that not a single dissenting vote was cast against it. Less than ten days ago it was the unanimous judgment of the Senate that this provision should stay in the bill. Now, within ten days from that time the Senator offers an amendment to strike the provision from the bill. If the Senate should strike this provision from the bill the country will think that the United States Senate is not very stable in mind. We said to the American people that we believe in this system, and we said, above all things, that this money should be kept at home.

Mr. President, that provision met the approval of the country. But all at once the Senator from Utah got light from somewhere, I know not where—he got light from somewhere and changed his mind, and he now asks the Senate of the United States to strike every provision of that amendment from the bill. [Mr. PAYNTER handed a newspaper clipping to Mr. CLAY.] I knew of that before. I do not like to refer to conferences that lead to Senators changing their opinion or that may or may not do so. I would rather discuss this amendment on its merits.

I declare to you, if this amendment is adopted and the bill is passed, we have defeated every purpose of the friends of this measure heretofore. Instead of being a bill to take care of the earnings and the savings of this class of people it will be a bill to enable the Treasury of the United States to sell its bonds and to place money in its Treasury.

Mr. SHIVELY and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and to whom?

Mr. CLAY. I will yield, first, to the Senator from Indiana and then to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the Senator will permit a suggestion. By the report of the committee, and a series of speeches made in the Senate, it is claimed by the supporters of this bill that the measure is designed to encourage habits of thrift, prudence, frugality, and economy. To this end it is intended that people who now hoard their money shall be induced to deposit it in the post-offices of the country. These people are represented as being distrustful of our present savings institutions. The pending bill is advocated as a measure to overcome distrust, to allay suspicion, to create confidence, and bring money from its hiding places into activity in commerce. At this juncture we are met by the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which provides that—when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in the bonds or other securities of the United States.

Here is a mighty fund of discretion lodged in the President. Saying nothing of the enormous temptation offered to powerful interests to produce the "other exigency" which shall set in motion the withdrawal of "all or any" of the deposits from the local banks, does any Senator believe that the power to call from the banks to Washington the money of the postal depositors and lock it away indefinitely from the depositor is calculated to reassure the doubtful, the distrustful, the suspicious, whom it is pretended this bill will induce to carry their money to the post-office? Will the men and women who now prefer the stocking, the tin can, the old crock, or the crevice in the wall to our present savings institutions intrust their money to a Government which announces in advance that their money may or shall be beyond their reach in case of "war or other exigency?" I submit these observations by way of suggestion rather than interrogatory, and probably should address them to the author of the amendment rather than to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLAY. I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLAY. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Georgia is a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads?

Mr. CLAY. I am.

Mr. SMOOT. And he voted for the bill as it came from the committee?

Mr. CLAY. I voted for the original bill as it came from the committee. There have been two bills that I recall reported from the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the last one.

Mr. CLAY. Oh, no; I was not present when the last bill was considered. I was not in the city, and had not been for some time. I was detained in a sanitarium in Atlanta, Ga., on account of sickness.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill as reported from the committee had no provision whatever for the moneys to remain in the banks.

Mr. CLAY. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I called the attention of the chairman to that afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. That is one reason, of course, why I offered the amendment, and I will say now——

Mr. CLAY. I am glad the Senator offered it. The country ought to thank the Senator for offering it, and the Senator ought to strive to keep it in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a question, of course, that I am not able to decide, but it seemed to me that if the amendment was in a shape in which it was unconstitutional, I ought not to take the responsibility of saying that it should go to the President in that shape. I want to bear witness to what the Senator from Montana has said, and also the Senator from New York, that in order to get a measure through the Senate it became apparent that there had to be some kind of a compromise, and the compromise, it seems to me, was made in the amendment that I offered, which I believe with all my heart carries out the thought and idea that the Senator wishes and that I desire, that the money should remain in the banks unless there was an exigency arising such as is named in the amendment. I do not believe that the President of the United States will ever use that authority unless there is some extreme emergency involving the credit of the country; he perhaps would not use it even in case of war if it were not necessary.

Mr. CLAY. For the life of me, I can not see how the Government can afford to take this money and invest it in bonds even in time of war. This money belongs to the depositors in sums of $125, $150, and $200, never beyond $500.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Government is the depositor in this case.

Mr. CLAY. I understand what I am saying, and let me get through. If the depositors should call for their money and the Government should take it and use it for war purposes, I do not see how the depositors could be paid the money.

Mr. SMOOT. They would be paid by the Government, as they have got to be paid, whether in time of war or in time of peace.

Mr. CLAY. When will they be paid?

Mr. SMOOT. They will be paid upon demand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I have been struggling with the best intelligence I could command to comprehend this bill and to persuade myself to vote for it, if I possibly could. That is my inclination; but I am troubled now on the very point that is raised by this amendment; that the Government may in time of war or in time of an exigency not related to war, but in any exigency take this money out of the banks and convert it into bonds.

The Senator from Montana has told us that there would be $5,000,000, and to-day he got it up to a billion dollars, deposited. In Great Britain, as I remember, the average deposit is less than $100. We will have, say, in this country 10,000,000 depositors. If an exigency arises, if a panic is imminent, we know how the depositors in our savings banks rush to the bank for their money to get it as speedily as they can. We will have 10,000,000 people in this country clamoring for their money that they have deposited in banks, and the Government will have it. I think we would have a war right on our hands at that moment.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be the case providing the people have no confidence whatever in the Government, but I believe the people will never demand the money of the Government unless they absolutely need it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The argument that is fundamental in this case is that we are dealing with a class of people who have no confidence in our banks; they are for the most part aliens, and they have not much confidence in our institutions, anyway. They might want to go home, and they will want their money.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Suppose they did?

Mr. SMOOT. I passed through a couple of panics, and I know this——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have passed through four or five or six.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean directly in connection with the banks during the panics. I know that the money that was withdrawn from the banks in very few cases was withdrawn to be used, and after the panic was over that same identical money was brought back by the same identical people and deposited in the banks again.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about that but these people will not have that privilege.

Mr. SMOOT. If this class of people are not afraid of the credit of the Government, they will not withdraw their deposits. Of course the theory is that this money would not interfere with the money in the banks; that it is going to bring out money that is in hiding; money that is already in the possession of the people who mistrust the banks and are perfectly willing to trust the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Georgia for permitting me to interrupt him.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. That does not at all meet the suggestion I made. There may not be much wit in what I said, but it strikes me that it is exactly what will happen.

Mr. CLAY. Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I knew I was right at the time; I had not forgotten it. We had before us Postmaster-General Meyer. The first speech I heard in favor of this legislation came from him, and it was a very intelligent speech. I have it before me now. He made the ablest argument I have heard in favor of this measure. He is a very superior man.

It is proposed to bring this money—into circulation by asking authority from Congress to place the deposits in the national banks of the country, not in a few financial centers, but in the banks of the district where the money has been deposited.

He says—

That is the only way that the system can be maintained. You are not going to do it by your amendment.

Mr. President, I do not believe this bill would have received a vote in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads had it been known that it was the purpose of Congress to take this money from the localities where located and brought to our centers.

This bill occupies a very peculiar position here now. I have never found a Senator yet a strong advocate of it as it stands. It will pass, I reckon; they say it will, but I have never found anybody in favor of it as it stands. It occupies a peculiar position. I doubt if the sober, thoughtful judgment of the Senate is in favor of this measure, especially if the amendment of the Senator from Utah is adopted.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that his amendment will not cure the entire evil produced by the amendment of the Senator from Utah. It will render the situation better, and I intend to vote for it; but the amendment of the Senator from Utah proposes to strike out lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of the bill, which provide that the money shall be kept in the localities where it is deposited, and to substitute certain lines in lieu thereof. The Senator from Iowa proposes to substitute certain words instead of the proviso of the Senator from Utah. If that amendment should be adopted, then it will be necessary to reject the amendment of the Senator from Utah as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. In other words, if we should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa and then adopt the amendment of the Senator from Utah as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, we will leave this bill without any provision that the money shall be kept in the local banks where deposited.

The amendment of the Senator from Utah will be in better condition for the country if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted, but, in my judgment, then the entire amendment ought to be defeated after the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only suggest to the Senator from Georgia that if the amendment I have proposed to the amendment of the Senator from Utah is adopted, I hope that either upon my motion or that of some other Senator that portion of the bill found on page 8, and in italics, will be reinserted in the bill.

Mr. CLAY. On page 8?

Mr. CUMMINS. On page 8, beginning with the word "Provided," in line 5, and ending with the words "per annum," in line 13. I recognize perfectly that in order to be complete, these words, which are the exact amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah and adopted by the Senate ten days or two weeks ago, shall be retained in the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I agree fully with the Senator from Iowa, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, and also the attention of the Senator from Georgia, to the fact that beginning with section 8 it says:

> That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks, whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, etc.

Then:

> If there is more than one such bank in any city, town, or village willing to take such deposits upon the terms provided for herein, the same shall be divided among them substantially according to their capital and surplus.

That provides positively that money shall be taken from the fund. If the Senator will turn to page 7, line 15, it provides:

> If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits are received.

Then the amendment offered by me yesterday, which was accepted, inserted the words "with the Treasurer," so as to read:

> With the Treasurer upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors or for the investment in bonds or other securities of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Do I understand the Senator to contend that if the proviso on page 6 is stricken out, including the part from line 5 to line 13, there is still a provision left providing that these funds shall be kept in the local banks at home?

Mr. SMOOT. I so contend under the terms of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. Under what provision?

Mr. SMOOT. The section which I have already read—section 8, on page 5:

> That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks.

It then goes on and states that such funds shall be deposited in banks—> whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, as urged by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] some two weeks ago, the bill with the words that I have referred to in italics, if they be stricken out, there will still be in the bill a direction that the funds shall be deposited in these banks, but there will be no prohibition in the bill against drawing the money out of the banks.

Mr. CLAY. That is what I was going to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the prohibition goes with the amendment that I offered here yesterday, on page 7, line 19, where it says:

> If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States.

And on the first page of the bill, line 7, an amendment was offered by me yesterday, as follows: "Carrying out the provisions of this act in reference to"—the receipt and investment, and so forth, of the fund. So it would be impossible for the money to be deposited anywhere else than in the banks.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senator from Utah offered his amendment on page 8, the proviso which I have read in regard to depositing these funds, to prevent their withdrawal except for certain purposes, to cure this very defect; in other words, there was a provision in this bill as to where this money should be deposited, but there was no provision to prevent its withdrawal. My understanding is that the Senator from Utah introduced his amendment, which was unanimously adopted, to cure this objection on the part of Senators—to prevent the withdrawal of these funds for investment in government securities.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President, but without the amendment offered by me yesterday on page 7, line 19, there would still be that defect. I think, however, that absolutely cures it because it says, "withdrawal of deposits with the Treasurer."

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, it is strange to me that the Senator from Utah discovered this defect, that the board of trustees could withdraw this money at any time from the banks and place it in a central bank if it was desired to do so, and in order to remedy this defect he offered an amendment, which was unanimously adopted by the Senate. Now he wants to have it stricken out.

Mr. President, this bill ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. If we intend to pass a bill simply to provide for the sale of government bonds and to place the money in the Treasury, we ought to say so, and abandon the idea of a postal savings-bank bill for the purpose of taking care of the small savings of the poor, unfortunate people of our country who have no confidence in our banks. If we intend to abandon the original purpose of the bill and to mix these funds with the funds to pay the current expenses of the Government and to utilize these funds for that purpose, let us in bold language say so.

I believe that a Treasury with just enough funds to bear the expenses of the Government is best for the American people. Show me a State or a nation which collects enough revenue and which only keeps a nominal surplus on hand, and I will show you a State or a nation where economy prevails on the part of the legislative body. A surplus of three or four or five hundred million dollars in your Treasury leads to extravagance. We have experienced that in the last five or six years. The three or four hundred million dollars which we had in the Treasury and which was deposited in our banks has led to a system of extravagance in the last five or six years in this country which is without precedent.

Mr. President, the fact that your Treasury is almost empty has led the leaders of the Senate to the conclusion that retrenchment and economy are absolutely necessary. If you desire to sell bonds and take the money and place it in the Treasury, it is certain to lead to extravagance. The very best way to avoid extravagance is to practice rigid economy and not to have too much idle money in your Treasury.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I simply rise to present a few obituary remarks upon the Constitution of the United States. It has been my cheerful custom quite a number of times in this Chamber to deliver brief funeral observations upon this lamented friend of ours. [Laughter.] The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and myself having participated in these obsequies and being among the principal pallbearers upon this joyous occasion, it is proper now, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], the chief embalmer and undertaker in charge of the ceremonies [laughter], is about to close the casket, that one of us, at least, should make a few tender references to the deceased [laughter], as the Senator from Montana permits us to take a last view of its distorted features. [Laughter.]

As the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] is one of the principal conspirators in this tragedy, and as a short time ago he delivered a biographical sketch of my constitutional infirmities, my remarks, very brief indeed, will be limited principally to the discourse of the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Before doing that, however, I desire to say that I do not agree in any sense of the word with the proposition of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the proposition of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that either of their amendments renders this bill a constitutional measure. I do not believe for a moment that you can take an unconstitutional bill, admitted to be so by the Senator from New York, and tack on to it an enumerated power of the Constitution, and thus make the bill constitutional. I do not believe—and I say it with the utmost deference and respect to the Senator from New York, for no one in this Chamber and no one outside of it has a greater respect and admiration than I have for the learning, the talent, the ability, and, what is more than all of them, the character of the Senator from New York—that you can take any bill, admitted to be unconstitutional, admitted not to be within the delegated powers of the Constitution, and then tack on a power that does not come within the purview or the meaning or the intent of the measure and make that measure a constitutional measure.

Nor do I agree with the remarks that have fallen from other Senators that the Supreme Court will not have the opportunity to look into this measure and declare it unconstitutional upon its face. Now, let me give this illustration to the Senator from New York. Suppose we were to incorporate a railroad to-day to run from the city of New York to the city of Albany, New York to be one terminus and Albany to be the other terminus—not an interstate railway, but an intrastate railway, to carry no freight, to carry no passengers, to perform no service beyond one terminus in the State of New York and another terminus in the same State and for local purposes alone—the Senator from New York will admit that the bill would be unconstitutional and that we have no right to pass a bill of that sort. Now, suppose that we were to provide that one-half of the profits of the railroad were to belong to the United States, or that they could borrow one-half the profits of that railroad, would that make it constitutional? I ask the Senator from New York whether, in his judgment, the right to borrow one-half the net or gross profits of that road under the borrowing power of the United States would render an unconstitutional bill constitutional by thus tacking to an unconstitutional bill one of the enumerated powers of the Constitution? Never, Mr. President, can I bring my mind to the acceptance of such a proposition as that.

We could pass any unconstitutional measure that we wanted simply by tacking on the bill a power of the Constitution, which it is not intended to exercise and which does not come within the intent and purpose of the bill and render it constitutional.

The object of the pending bill is not to borrow money on the credit of the United States. There is not a Senator on this floor who could truthfully arise and say that our purpose here is to borrow money on the credit of the United States. The Government of the United States is not borrowing money in such a way as this. This is not a bill entitled "A bill to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Whoever heard of a bill to borrow money on the credit of the United States that does not even say in its title that it is a bill intended for such a purpose? There is not a section in this measure, except these two amendments, one proposed by the Senator from New York and one proposed by the Senator from Utah, which contemplates that this money should thus be invested in bonds of the United States.

What is this amendment put in for—to effectuate a governmental purpose? Never; not a word of it. It is attached to this bill for the purpose of giving it a constitutional appearance, for the purpose of giving the Supreme Court of the United States a loophole by which it can declare this measure—a measure unconstitutional when it was offered, unconstitutional all through the debate—constitutional by putting on an amendment to enable the Government to invest the money in United States bonds.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest to the Senator, in that connection, that one of the learned Senators on the other side suggested that it would make it more constitutional.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator has eliminated that from the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. Has he?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that.

Mr. RAYNER. Make it "quasi constitutional," I suppose. It is either constitutional or it is not constitutional. I do not believe, with the greatest deference to both the Senators, that either of these amendments add one iota to the validity of this measure. I think that this bill is just as good, or, rather, just as bad, without the amendments as it is with them.

It is said that the Supreme Court can not go behind them. Why not? Because in the oleomargarine case and in the case of the Veazie Bank v. Fenno they said, "We can not tell what the motives of Congress were when the bill was passed." This is a different measure. The Supreme Court can very easily tell what was the motive of Congress.

Here is a bill that does not say a word about war. Whoever heard anything about war until the Senator from Utah rose in this body to declare war under a postal-depository bill? [Laughter.] For months and months this debate has progressed. Has anybody said anything about war? Is there any war in existence? Is there any war imminent? Is there a purpose upon the part of the Government of the United States to use the postal-depository savings for the purpose of furnishing the resources of war?

I use the words, I hope, in no objectionable sense, but it is a legal subterfuge; it is an artifice; it is stratagem; it is tacked onto this bill simply for the purpose of enabling the Supreme Court to say, "We can not tell from the text of this bill whether it is in reality a postal-depository bill, which is unconstitutional, or whether it is a bill to borrow money upon the credit of the United States, which is constitutional." It can not be done, Mr. President, because the Supreme Court will look through this bill, and not one word will they find from the beginning to the end about borrowing money on the credit of the United States.

This bill has been discussed for months. It was discussed at the last session. The Senator from Montana has been challenged, but he has declined to accept the challenge, to state upon this floor that this bill had any other purpose or any other intent in view except the intent to create postal savings depositories.

Therefore, Mr. President, before I come briefly to state the purpose for which I have arisen, I want to stand here not only as a Democrat—because I do not see how our party can divide upon this question—but as a student of the Constitution, to say that I do not believe, and never will believe until the Supreme Court decides it, that when you pass a measure admitted to be unconstitutional, admitted not to be within the express or any implied powers of that instrument, that simply by saying that the Government can borrow the money from these postal depositories and invest it in government bonds that that makes the measure come within the meaning of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, I will proceed briefly to reply to the address of the Senator from Nebraska. I think perhaps it would have been better for the senior Senator from Nebraska to have allowed his first speech upon this bill to remain as it was without attempting to correct it, because in his first speech he was simply at war with every other lawyer in the United States except himself, and in his last speech he is at war with all of them, including himself [laughter], and he has precipitated himself into such a wilderness of confusion that even the senior Senator from Montana will not be able to find him; and if he should succeed in finding him, he will be utterly unable, with all his dexterity and ingenuity, to extricate him.

I tried to compliment the Senator from Nebraska when he stated a proposition that, to say the least, aroused the curiosity of every law student and apprentice in his profession in the land who read the observations of the Senator. The Senator does not desire any compliment, however. He would rather stand out in bold relief, challenging and defying the rudimentary principles of his profession, than make an acknowledgment that he had thoughtlessly stated a proposition which, upon further reflection, he deemed it best to reconsider; an acknowledgment that would have served as a sufficient explanation even for a Senator of such recognized professional attainments as the Senator from Nebraska seems to be gifted with.

Now let us glance at some of the treasures of thought that fell from the Senator in this last address of his upon the subject of this bill. The Senator remarked as follows:

The distinguished Senator from Maryland, in one of his heroic and habitual defenses of the Constitution a day or two ago, criticised a speech of mine at the last session of Congress upon the postal savings bank. In fact, a little colloquy between the Senator and myself during the time of my address, which I am sure no one else who heard it took so seriously, seems to have lain heavily upon the Senator's mind during all these intervening months.

Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. I did not take his address seriously. The Senator should exculpate me from this imputation. I have not taken the Senator seriously. Furthermore, I respectfully submit that if nothing ever lay more heavily upon my mind than the Senator's speech, I would have the lightest and most buoyant intellect of any Senator in this body. [Laughter.]

The Senator then proceeds to say Madison was a great linguist. Admitting this to be so, there is one thing that Mr. Madison never was, and that is that while he may have been a great linguist he never claimed to be a ventriloquist. [Laughter.] The Senator says:

I have neither the time, the inclination, nor the equipment at the moment to undertake an exhaustive address on this subject. I am not vain enough to hope that I shall be able to do what Hamilton and Adams and Webster and the mighty Marshall could not do.

Why not? [Laughter.] The Senator underrates himself. He may not have the time nor the inclination, but he certainly has the equipment. The Senator is always prepared upon one theme as well as another, semper paratus, a gift of Providence of being thoroughly prepared upon subjects with which you are entirely unfamiliar. Why should not the Senator therefore be able to do what Hamilton and Adams and Webster and Marshall could not do? No one of them ever delivered a speech like his. [Laughter.] They could not do that. Therefore the Senator can do what Hamilton and Adams and Webster and the mighty Marshall could not do. We require no greater proof of that than this constitutional argument of the Senator from Nebraska. Great thought, great power, profound research, and, above all, a matchless voice that, reechoed through the corridors and coming back upon the waves of sound, victoriously and triumphantly rode upon the circumambient air. [Laughter.]

The trouble with the Senator is not that he can not do what Hamilton and Adams and Webster and Marshall could not do, but that he did not live in the early days of the Republic, so that he could have shed the illuminating light of his eagle intellect upon the Constitution of the country. Mr. President, that is the trouble with a great many men of wonderful gifts—they live at the wrong time. [Laughter.] If the Senator had been a member of the Constitutional Convention, what a different instrument we would have had, and how men like Hamilton, and Patterson, and Wilson, and Madison, and Rutledge, and Pinckney would have paled into insignificance beside the marvelous and majestic genius of the Senator from Nebraska! The Senator has done what Marshall and Taney never accomplished, because the Senator seems to have studied the Constitution only for about seven days, but within that time he has acquired a familiarity with it greater than both Marshall and Taney, who spent, together, over sixty years upon the Supreme Bench of the United States, interpreting its provisions, and both of whom, at various times, gave expression to the thought that they had hardly approached the threshold of that immortal charter.

Now, the Senator says, speaking of me:

If he had been called for to preach, he probably would have specialized on funerals and chanted requiems to the dead and gone of his fellow-men.

I do not know if this classical allusion to myself by the Senator was intended as an insult or a compliment. If it was intended as an insult I feel highly complimented, and if it was intended as a compliment I feel deeply chagrined. [Laughter.] I would suggest to the Senator that I have no talent along this line. I can neither sing nor chant, but if the time should unexpectedly come when the people of Nebraska desire to celebrate the Senator's political funeral, and such a great calamity should befall them, I will take the liberty of sending as my substitute the junior Senator from Tennessee, who, with his other gifts, possesses great talent in this direction, and he will chant a requiem that in lyric and pathetic tones will, perhaps, fully console the constituencies of Nebraska for the irreparable loss that they have sustained by the premature departure of the Senator at the very meridian of his brilliant power.

The Senator now goes on to observe:

I hope, however, that I am not insane enough to undertake to turn from the accepted construction of these words, quite as old as the words themselves—

Referring to the general-welfare clause of the Constitution.

Mr. President, the Senator should relieve me from this charge. I never said that the Senator was insane. I would not take this speech of his and upon that single effort make a decision upon that question. [Laughter.] I have given some attention and study to diseases of the mind, but it would be necessary for me to take a number of the Senator's speeches before arriving at any definite conclusion. [Laughter.] I therefore think that the Senator has mixed me up with some other alienist who has perhaps given an opinion upon the subject. [Laughter.]

And now the Senator further observes, referring to me, that I deny myself the splendor of contemporary achievement. That is another mistake upon the Senator's part. I listened to the whole of the Senator's great argument from beginning to end, and therefore I have not denied myself what I consider the splendor of the greatest contemporary achievement of modern times.

When the Senator comes right down to the great proposition with which he is struggling in trying to reconcile himself to his former utterances, Mr. President, listen to this priceless gem:

This bill—

Says he—would be constitutional if Congress believed it would be beneficial in raising and supporting an army.

What a sublime thought! How original in its conception and how unlimited in its expansive possibilities! Here is another jewel, plucked from the very crown of jurisprudence, as a constitutional sanction for its enactment:

It would stimulate trade—

Says the Senator—

and revive the drooping energies of the country and restore confidence to the public mind.

What do you think of that, Mr. President, that among the enumerated powers these undiscovered faculties had been concealed for years until discovered by the Senator from Nebraska, the delegated power upon the part of Congress to restore confidence to the public mind and revive the drooping energies of the country.

Mr. President, I have made these few remarks simply to prevent the Senator's speech from being consigned to oblivion. I have studied it word for word and bestowed upon it all the concentrated attention of my mind. We know by experience that no matter what merits it possesses it may in the multiplicity of arguments that emanate day by day from the Halls of Congress be lost to view, and when once lost to contemporary history it may be gone forever. Sad episodes like this have often occurred before. Some of the finest specimens of literature and some of the greatest efforts of statesmanship have escaped the attention of those for whom they were written and to whom they have been addressed, and sometimes after a century of forgetfulness they have been resurrected from their graves. This ought not to be the fate of the Senator's effort. It ought not to be its fate, because the thoughts it conveys are absolutely original. It has not a feature of imitation about it. It gives to the rising generation an entirely new conception of constitutional guaranties and places the Constitution in a light that it has never been placed before. With no hand to guide him, no beaten track to follow, and no example to emulate, the Senator has struck out for himself, and, to use a borrowed phrase, he has "floated serenely on the surface," absolutely unconscious of the unfathomed depths beneath. With dauntless and intrepid voice he has proclaimed the principle that whenever Congress believes that any of its enactments will accomplish some enumerated power of the Constitution the belief of Congress settles the constitutionality of its legislation. It is not as Marshall said, "That Congress is the judge of the degree of necessity, and if the means are proper to accomplish any enumerated power then the courts will not interfere with the discretion of Congress if adapted to the end." This is no longer the formula. No "such pent-up Utica" contracts the boundless aspirations of the Senator. If it is useful, if it is beneficial, says the Senator, then Congress is alone the judge of its constitutionality.

That I may not misquote the Senator from Nebraska, let me read, because it is only a few lines, his language upon this subject:

If the object of this bill is needed, or if it will be helpful, in the opinion of Congress, to regulate and promote commerce among the States, it is proper under the commerce clause of the Constitution. If it will be useful to the Government in borrowing money, it can be maintained under the clause authorizing Congress to borrow money. If Congress believes it would be beneficial in raising and supporting an army, it is constitutional.

Then all that it is necessary for us to do is to believe that the legislation we are enacting is constitutional, and that makes it constitutional beyond the investigation of the Supreme Court. It need not be necessary, it need not be proper within the language of the Constitution, it need not be the means adapted to the end, but if it is helpful, if it is beneficial and we believe it is constitutional, that settles forever the constitutionality of the legislation. Transcendent thoughts!

Mr. President, should a discovery like this be permitted to die?—and it may die unless some steps are taken to save it. Some necessary and proper means should, therefore, be devised to rescue it from oblivion. The Senator alone has it within his power to accomplish this purpose. Transcripts and copies and duplicates of his constitutional discovery should be sent to every academy and college and university and seat of learning in the land wherever constitutional law is taught, so that some day, when this great edifice, with its broken columns and arches, may crumble into ruin, these imperishable utterances of the Senator from Nebraska shall endure and survive, "wrapped in the solitude of their own originality, immutable amid change, magnificent amid ruin."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as soon as the Senate can compose itself after listening to these delightful exchanges——

Mr. BAILEY. There has been no exchange yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. I have it in mind to say a last word, so far as I am concerned, upon the amendment now before the Senate, and lest the entrancement of the last few minutes has driven from our minds the exact question before the body, I beg to state that the Senator from Utah has introduced an amendment which provides that the money collected at the post-offices, having been deposited in the banks of the country, may be withdrawn if, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government shall so require, and be invested in the bonds or other securities of the United States.

The amendment which I have proposed so changes the amendment of the Senator from Utah that the judgment of the President with regard to the exigency involving the public credit can only be exercised in time of war.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure, as I always listen with pleasure, to the observations of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I listened with a great deal of interest to the observations of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. The Senator from New York evidently believes that I am either unfamiliar with the Constitution of my country or that I am indifferent with regard to that immortal instrument. Both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Montana are of the opinion that I am unpatriotic; that no matter what may be the constitutional difficulties encountered, I am unpatriotic in suggesting that the moneys to be deposited in the banks of the United States may not or ought not to be withdrawn to meet any exigency that peace may create, or that may arise in time of peace involving the credit of our Government.

I can not agree with the analysis of this measure as suggested by the Senator from New York. He says it has been his conception that we were to establish in the United States a postal savings institution similar to the institutions which the countries of Europe have for years maintained. If that be his conception of a proper and effectual postal savings system in the United States, it is one that was not, at least, contemplated in the convention whose announcement upon this subject we are endeavoring to carry into effect.

I will not go far back into the literature of a postal savings system in our country. I only need to go so far back as is evidenced by the speeches and the writings of the President of the United States and of his Postmasters-General for the last four or five years. I never heard, nor do I believe that any other Senator here has ever heard, a recommendation from a President of the United States or a recommendation from a Postmaster-General which involved the investment of these funds in the bonds of the United States.

When the convention met in Chicago in 1908 the plan was already crystallized, the plan had already been announced, and that plan, so far as I remember, involved the deposit of these moneys in the banks of the country. It was not fashioned after the systems of Europe. It is well known that in all the countries of Europe—I think I speak accurately in saying in all the countries of Europe—in which there is a postal savings system in force the public debt is constantly increasing, and the increase or advance in the public debt absorbs the savings of the people that are gathered in the post-offices. Fortunately it has been the policy of the United States to decrease as rapidly as it could its public debt. It was not contemplated when the convention of 1908 met that the public debt should increase from year to year and bonds issued on that account should absorb the savings of these people, who, distrusting the banks, give their faith to their Government.

I therefore must dissent from the view suggested by the Senator from New York, that the only true and genuine concept of a postal savings institution is one in which the Government receiving the money invests it in its own bonds or own securities or uses it for the purpose of discharging its ordinary functions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is speaking about the convention. The platform specifically states in terms the purpose of establishing the system. It says "for the convenience of the people."

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not overlook the words so well suggested by the Senator from Indiana, but I was trying to make it clear to Senators here that there never has been in any formal way until now a suggestion that the savings collected at the post-offices should be invested in bonds or securities of the United States, save in the event that the banks of the community in which the money is gathered refuse to take the money at an appropriate or profitable rate of interest.

When I came into the Senate one year ago there was already a postal savings bill reported to the Senate, and it was then the unfinished business of the Senate. It provided that the money collected at the post-offices should be deposited in the national banks of the United States and should be there held to meet the exigencies of the service—that is, repayment to depositors. I instantly suggested that there was no righteousness or justice in giving this privilege exclusively to national banks; and therefore, as Senators will remember, I introduced an amendment, and presented it with what argument I could summon, in favor of admitting the state banks to the list of depositories, so that there would be no discrimination between the national and the state banks in this respect.

After this amendment had been debated for several weeks from time to time that bill was recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and it came this session in practically its present form, namely, that the money collected at the post-offices should be deposited in both state and national banks and there retained until needed to pay the depositors who had left their savings with the post-offices.

Now, mark, when that bill was debated two weeks ago the Senator from Utah believing that the amendment which I presented, namely, that this money must be deposited in the banks, state and national, so long as they were willing to receive it or pay a fair rate of interest upon it, was not sufficiently protective, standing like the guardian for that portion of the country that he represents, offered the amendment which is sought to be stricken out by his present proposal. He believed, then, that not only should we have in this bill a positive direction that the money collected at the offices should be deposited in both state and national banks, but he insisted that there should be an emphatic prohibition against the withdrawal of the money from these banks save for purposes of paying depositors and defraying the expenses of administering the bill; and I assume he is still of that opinion.

But let us see what has changed the atmosphere in this Chamber? The Senate adopted the amendment of the Senator from Utah—and I may say in passing that the amendment was accepted and assented to by the Senator from Montana. He then realized that if we were not to inflict upon this country an evil instead of rendering it a service, there must be these positive prohibitions against the withdrawal of the money for any save the purposes I have suggested. He gave his assent to the amendment of the Senator from Utah, and it became a part of this bill without one dissenting voice, so far as I can now remember. And with that amendment the policy was complete, namely, that the money taken in at the post-offices should not only be deposited in the banks, if they were willing to pay the interest upon it, but that it should remain in the banks until withdrawn for the purposes named in the amendment itself. What has happened? What has changed the opinions of the Senator from Utah and of the Senator from Montana? Abstractly, the Senator from Utah declares he still clings to what the Senator from New York declares to be a flagrant heresy.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana advocates the amendment presented by the Senator from Utah, as previously stated, believing that it is necessary to make that amendment in order to insure the passage of the bill. I rise to ask the Senator from Iowa—to save the bill, to secure its passage—is he willing to concede as much?

Mr. CUMMINS. When we reach mere matters of comparison, it is impossible for me to weigh one objection that may be in my mind with an objection that may be in the mind of the Senator from Montana. I will answer, however, the question in its substance, in this way. I believe in the postal savings institution, and I believe its object is wise and that its operation will be helpful; but if the organization of a system of this sort means the withdrawal from time to time, by the order of the President of the United States or by the order of the board of trustees of the money gathered into the banks through its operation, then I believe further that an injury will be inflicted upon the business and people of the United States far outmeasuring any good that can be accomplished by collecting the savings at the post-offices; and if when this bill is finally put upon its passage, it is in such form that it does not protect the money gathered in a community for the business of that community, I shall vote against it. I hope the Senator from Montana will do as much.

Just a moment further upon this same subject. The only purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah—I do not mean that it is his conscious intent, but the only effect of the amendment now offered by the Senator from Utah is to destroy in a certain contingency the amendment that he offered and that the Senate adopted two weeks ago. There can be no escape from that conclusion.

I understand the Senator from Montana to assume an entirely different attitude and one which is much more consistent, if I may be permitted to compliment him to that extent. The Senator from Montana yields what he believes to be right and what I know to be right, because he thinks that if we frame this bill as it should be framed there are Senators here who will not vote for it who otherwise might vote for it.

This is the exact situation at the present moment. Without any invidious comparisons, without attempting to waive the credit which should be attached to the motives of either Senator I vastly prefer the attitude of the Senator from Montana. He is willing to do what he thinks is wrong, because he hopes that he may in that way accomplish a greater right. But I am not able to understand the position of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CARTER and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARTER. I hope the Senator will yield to me for one moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana, and then to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, honest differences of opinion have arisen with reference to the appropriate disposition of these funds when collected in the banks. The amendment originally presented by the Senator from Utah provided that these funds should never be withdrawn from the banks as long as the banks were willing to pay the stipulated rate of interest and provide the required security. Certain other Senators, equally honest in their purpose, believed that in certain exigencies which might arise it would be well and wise to have these funds, or a portion of them, invested in bonds or securities of the United States. That view is not wrong. It may be impolitic or unwise, but as to the application of the terms "right," on the one hand, and "wrong," on the other, I think the Senator from Iowa may well make a modification.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senate did not understand that in using the word "wrong" as applied to the Senator from Montana I intended to be understood as imputing to him any wrong motive whatsoever. I was comparing his views as expressed two weeks ago with the position that is now assumed. If I am in error I hope the Senator will correct me, if the Senator from Montana has stated this afternoon that he still holds exactly the opinion with regard to this particular subject that he held when the Smoot amendment was adopted, and that he is willing to surrender to a certain extent in order to accomplish what he believes to be a greater good.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, I can straighten this out very easily.

Mr. CARTER. I pray the Senator from Texas to desist for a moment. I think we can straighten it out better. The Senator has his own peculiar point of view with reference to matters, and I do not think it ought to be interjected here.

Mr. BAILEY. It is the same point of view I have had all the time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not object to hearing either Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Iowa, in his last statement, very nearly expressed my own point of view. All legislation is, in both branches of Congress and between the two Houses, the result of mutual concessions in the main. No bill that passes either House meets the approval of every member of either House. In this case, in endeavoring to secure the adoption of a measure which, in my opinion, will prove of enduring benefit to the American people, respecting the views of the Senator from New York and likewise the views of the Senator from Iowa, it has appeared to me that in order to secure a majority for the measure on this floor a fair accommodation between these views, either in itself free from any moral wrong, is both in conformity with legislative procedure and good sense as well.

I realize that the retention of the amendment of the Senator from Utah in the bill would make its passage difficult if not impossible. The modification of that amendment presented by the Senator from Utah seemed to me to bring about such an accommodation between contending views as would reach a common ground upon which all could stand in the furtherance of a common purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not listening to the Senator when he made his reference particularly to me in relation to changing my amendment, but from what the Senator from Montana has said I gather it that the Senator has charged that my position is absolutely reversed from what it was when I originally offered the amendment. Is that it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not correct the Senator if he had not just said he did not hear what I remarked upon that subject. What I said was that the amendment which was adopted at the suggestion of the Senator from Utah two weeks ago, or thereabouts, is inconsistent with the amendment which the Senator from Utah now proposes. I said that the Senator from Montana had explained the change of attitude on his part, but that I had heard no such adequate explanation of the change on the part of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have made several explanations of the reason why I offered the second amendment. I have told the Senate that I am in thorough sympathy with what the Senator from Iowa has stated he is in sympathy with. I want to have the money deposited in the banks to remain in the banks, and I want it to remain there unless circumstances arise, as provided in the second amendment.

Mr. President, I may say that I do not believe conditions and circumstances will arise under which the President of the United States will authorize the board of trustees to withdraw that money from the banks and buy government bonds. If I thought that was the effect of the amendment, if I thought that would be the result, I would not be in favor of it. But I do not believe that that would be the effect and result of the amendment.

I will say further, as I said this afternoon, that there was a consultation as to the amendment, and I was convinced as far as I could be convinced that the original amendment offered would make the bill unconstitutional. That being the case, I felt that it was my duty as a Senator of the United States, if it were in my power, to offer an amendment to reach the same end that the original amendment reached, but being constitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment I have proposed would relieve the President of any temptation. I hope that the prophecy of the Senator from Utah will be fulfilled, but this is a struggle, and we might as well recognize it, between two conflicting policies. I understand perfectly, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, that every bit of legislation of an important character must be a compromise, if you will, and there is no surrender of principle in yielding to detail. But there is a surrender of principle and we do enter upon a domain in which compromise is impossible when we touch a fundamental feature of the bill.

I proceed in the review of the situation. I recall you now to the conditions which existed after the Senate had adopted the amendment of the Senator from Utah. Then for the first time it began to be rumored, and there is probably not a Senator here but who heard it, that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] was of the opinion that the bill as thus framed was unconstitutional, and that he intended to introduce an amendment providing for the investment of these funds in bonds or securities of the United States in order to make the bill constitutional and, as we have heard this morning, in order, further, to promote the best welfare and the highest policy of our common country.

It was not long after this rumor became current until the President of the United States declared, with that frankness which is common to him, which characterizes him upon every occasion, precisely what he thought with regard to the bill that was then before the Senate. He declared in the most explicit terms that, in his judgment, should the bill pass as it had been amended by the Senator from Utah it would be unconstitutional, and that he desired an opportunity to use the funds collected at the post-offices in the extinguishment or the acquisition of the 2 per cent bonds now held by the national banks of the country.

This was his view of the matter. I am not criticising it. I recognize that honest difference of opinion which was so well and so graphically described a moment ago by the Senator from Montana. I think none the less of the Senator from New York because he does not agree with me upon this question. All that I insist on is that men shall have opinions, and having them shall stand for them and shall vote for them from the beginning to the end of a measure of this sort.

After the declaration by the very officer who would have the right under this bill to declare that an exigency exists which requires these funds to be invested in bonds of the United States, then began this effort to amend the bill in the way suggested first by the Senator from New York. I think it became rather apparent that his amendment would not receive the approval of the Senate, and when that knowledge came to the minds of those who were arranging the matter they began to discover or to endeavor to discover how nearly they could approach the position of the Senator from New York without losing a majority of the Senators in this body.

If by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah we not only compromise a difference of opinion in detail upon this bill, but if we accede to the proposition of the Senator from New York indirectly, not appearing to do it directly, we have not compromised any difference of opinion, but we have weakly surrendered the most essential and the most fundamental principle of the measure.

Now, let us see precisely what we do if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Utah. We declare that when, in the judgment of the President of the United States, an exigency arises which involves the public credit, these funds may all be withdrawn and, as I look at it, precipitate the very disaster that he might seek to avert.

We are not legislating for a single year, for two years, or three years. Who knows what the President of the United States will hold to be an exigency involving the public credit? We have discovered this morning in the debate that has already taken place what some of the Senators believe would be an exigency involving the public credit. That exigency is whenever the Government can not sell its bonds at a price that it desires to sell them, whenever a government bond might fall below par, whenever the clouds of financial trouble settle over the city of New York, and it becomes necessary for the Government of the United States to come to the relief of the banks of New York, or of Chicago, or of Boston, or of Philadelphia. Then an exigency has arisen which will not only warrant but require the President under the terms of this amendment to withdraw from every bank in the United States the funds theretofore deposited and use those funds to purchase the bonds of the United States that may then be purchasable that the President or any other officer may then have a right under the law to issue and put upon the market.

We might as well look this matter squarely in the eye. As I said the other day, I am willing that in the event of war these funds may be withdrawn; and why am I willing? Because war is declared, not by the President, but by Congress, and I assume that if Congress should declare war and it should not believe that these funds ought to be withdrawn from the banks, then some other provision would be made by Congress itself. Here is a power vested in the President immeasurably greater than was ever before committed to any administrative or executive officer of the Government. It is exactly equivalent to a power that would be granted in a legislative act which would declare that whenever the President of the United States desired to do so he might issue an unlimited amount of bonds in order to sustain the credit of the country.

But I am not impressed with the pathetic description and the mournful picture presented by the Senator from New York. I have the liveliest hope that this country of ours will be as strong in the future as it has been in the past. We have now sustained the credit of the Government. Although confronted with the direst perils for a hundred years and more, we have managed to maintain our credit and transact our affairs without the funds gathered in the post-offices from the poor people of the country.

The Senator from New York suggests that in the event of a financial disaster, if all the people who had given money to the post-offices should demand their money, the Government would have no way in which to meet their demands save by drawing the money from the banks. Is it so? If Congress desires to give the Government or any officers of the Government the power to sell bonds in order to pay these depositors, I shall make no objection. That will be one way to meet the exigency or the remote contingency suggested by the Senator from New York.

I do not believe there ever will be such a contingency. If this system is valuable at all, if it is not simply a trick put upon the people of the United States, then the very moment of disaster will see an increase in the confidence of the people in their Government, and, instead of there being a great army of depositors besieging the doors of the United States for the withdrawal of their deposits, there will be an increasing army desiring to deposit their money with the United States in order to escape the hazards and the perils of depositing these moneys in the banks. That is a pure flight of fancy, intended in perfect good faith, of course, because the Senator from New York has the courage to proclaim the policy that he favors; and I would that we might meet in square, unequivocal issue in this body the question of policy as proposed by him and the policy as proposed in the bill at the present time.

I agree with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], if I may be permitted to approach the constitutional question involved in the bill, that the addition of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah can not affect the constitutionality of this measure. No more, in my opinion, will the addition of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York affect the constitutionality of the bill. I may not agree with the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] with regard to every legal phase of this controversy, for I have brought my mind to the conclusion that there is a resting place in the Constitution for a measure of this character, but it is not in the clause that gives Congress the power to borrow money upon the credit of the United States; it is not in the clause that confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States. If we have the power to pass this bill, it is because of the power given to Congress to establish post-offices, supplemented, possibly, by the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

I do not intend to enter upon the discussion of that matter. I have views upon it, but the whole field has been so thoroughly explored that it would be idle for me to attempt to add anything to what has already been contributed upon the subject. But I could not allow the debate to close without saying that, as for me, I do not hide myself behind the power to borrow money or the power to regulate commerce among the States.

I suggest to the Senator from New York that he violated in his argument the high and noble precept that he so impressively fastened upon our consciences. I believe that there is a Constitution in the Senate of the United States, a Constitution to be obeyed and respected by us as fully and completely and faithfully and religiously as we expect it to be obeyed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I deny the right of the Senate to attach to any bill a clause or a proviso that is intended merely as a pretext upon which the Supreme Court may declare our act constitutional. If we do so, we may enable the court itself to perform its high obligation, but we disregard our own oaths in that respect. We are not borrowing money in this bill or making any provision for borrowing money. There is not a government on earth that would borrow money under the terms of a bill like this. The United States does not want to borrow money payable on demand. It is contrary to its fundamental policy to do so. There is no pretext among Senators that we would enter into this measure if our object was to borrow money. We may want to borrow money to finish the Panama Canal; we may want to borrow money to complete the irrigation projects that are now somewhat advanced; but we do not want to borrow money from the people who are invited to deposit their savings at the post-offices. What we are trying to do—and if we are not trying to do it we ought to abandon the whole measure—is to encourage the habit of saving. What we are trying to do is to instill into the minds and hearts of those who have a little surplus at the end of their day's work or their month's work, as the case may be, and desire to save a little of it, at any rate, in order to provide for a day of misfortune in the future.

That is what we are trying to do; and I for one refuse to satisfy my conscience as to the constitutionality of this bill by alleging that I can convert it into a bill to borrow money by providing that under a certain contingency the money may be invested in the bonds of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa in connection with that remark, because it has given me some trouble. Would it be borrowing money from the accumulated fund to convert it into bonds?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my answer is "no."

Mr. HEYBURN. It would merely change the form of money that the Government already has?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. HEYBURN. So that there is in it none of the element of borrowing money under section 8 of Article I of the Constitution?

Mr. CUMMINS. Such is my conclusion, and I hope that my reasoning led to that result.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just one more suggestion. In contemplation of law, can the Government have any money anywhere except in the Treasury of the United States? Is not the money in the Treasury of the United States, when it has it loaned out to banks, in contemplation of law?

Mr. CUMMINS. Theoretically, I believe it is the money of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, could we authorize the President now, upon the happening of something contingent in the future, to use as an appropriated sum of money any part of it? I think not. Does it amount to any more——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not attempt to answer the question.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. I shall be glad to make an observation in connection with the question of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. President, under this bill, if enacted into law, this fund will be under the control of the board of trustees, subject to the provisions of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me ask a question there. Will it be money of the United States, and technically in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. CARTER. Not technically in the Treasury of the United States, but with the Treasurer, who is declared to be the treasurer of this board. The funds—the board having the guardianship of the entire matter—may be either deposited in the banks or invested in bonds, as the case may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then are we to understand that there is a guardian who stands between the Government and its money?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this board of trustees will as completely control these funds, subject only to the restrictions of this law, as the board of trustees of any incorporated company will control its funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. Congress could not appropriate from this fund?

Mr. CARTER. Of course Congress could repeal the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was not the question.

Mr. CARTER. Congress could make other disposition of the fund. Congress will have control of the board of trustees, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Could they appropriate money to be paid out of this fund? Could Congress appropriate the money? I want to get the status of the fund, if I am not trenching upon the time of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. Congress would be, of course, omnipotent in the premises.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then Congress could appropriate money for general governmental purposes and could provide that it could be paid out of this fund, then, could it?

Mr. CARTER. Providing Congress desired to alter this law in a radical sense, Congress could provide that these moneys be deposited directly in the Treasury of the United States, to be used for current expenses. Congress may provide, as this bill contemplates, for its deposit in the local banks or, in certain contingencies, for investment in securities. Congress, in the last analysis, controls the whole matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am perfectly aware of that, but that is not the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I pursue the thought just taken up by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], and therein lies the baselessness of all the fear that has been expressed in the Chamber this afternoon in regard to the consequences which might ensue if we were to fall upon days of trouble. Congress has the power to deal with this money in whatsoever way it desires. It seems to be the policy of Congress at the present time to deposit this money in the banks. Let us adhere to that policy until Congress itself shall change it. If it becomes necessary, even in time of peace, to use this money for the life of the Government, Congress is the body that ought to devote it to that purpose; and it ought to be the only body that could control these funds or destroy the policy which it itself creates.

But I pass to one further question, and then I shall have finished. Assuming that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is necessary in order to make the law constitutional—and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], with some reluctance and with some hesitation, agrees that the bill would be constitutional if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah were adopted—let us now see in what legal respect the amendment which is now before the Senate, and which I have proposed, must be viewed, or in what legal respect will the bill be changed. Will any lawyer here say that an amendment which declares that these funds may be withdrawn from the banks if in the judgment of the President an exigency of war or any other exigency requires them to be so withdrawn is rendered unconstitutional when the amendment is changed so as to limit the discretion or power of the President to a case of actual war? No one has so contended; no one can so contend.

Mark you, I am not asserting that the Smoot amendment, so-called, makes this bill constitutional, if it is otherwise unconstitutional; but I am contending that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah renders the bill invulnerable to an attack from its constitutional side, then the amendment that I have proposed will leave the bill just as strong and as invulnerable against such an attack as it would be were the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to be adopted without change.

I earnestly hope that we shall not open the door to a withdrawal of these funds from the banks of the country in which they are to be deposited. I have yet, so far as the region from which I come is concerned, to hear of one man who is in favor of the establishment of a postal savings system that has in it any possibility of the withdrawal of the moneys from the communities in which those moneys are collected.

I beg to submit further that the people who hold these views are as patriotic, as liberty loving, as careful of the honor and credit of their country as are the people of any part of this broad land. I beg you, when you come to consider this question, to understand that substantially the whole merit of the controversy which has waged here now for weeks and for months is involved in the amendment which I have proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have been anxious to vote for a bill which, while aiding the Government in its governmental function of maintaining a stable volume of money and aiding the Government to keep that money in the channels of trade free from obstruction or diversion, would at the same time encourage habits of thrift among the wage-earners of the country. I shall not enter into the discussion of the constitutional question. I shall assume, for the purposes of argument, that the Government has the power under the Constitution to adopt a measure that will prevent the tying up of the currency of the country, its diversion from the channels of trade, and its withdrawal to the stockings and strong boxes of the people. My contention is that, assuming the constitutional power, this bill does not present a means appropriate to that end. I believe that this measure is only partial in its attempt to guard the country against financial stringency, and that the action which we should take upon the subject should be much broader and more comprehensive.

In the first place, it must be recollected that the wage-earners constitute a very small proportion of the depositors in commercial banks, and that when you do something to allay their alarm in times of crises, you do not necessarily allay the alarm of other classes of the community who are likewise depositors, and who, experience shows, are as likely as the wage-earners to take alarm and to withdraw their money from the banks and deposit it in strong boxes. I believe that we should strengthen confidence in the banks by measures strengthening their reserves and their capital, by measures increasing their cooperation and mutual support in times of stringency, by measures which will compel state banks, like state railroads, as instruments of interstate commerce, to apply the safety devices required by the National Government, and by measures bringing them into association with each other in the various financial districts of the country, in mutual supervision and watchfulness that will eliminate bad banking, and in a mutual support that will unite all their forces and resources in time of danger. I would prevent the massing of the reserves of the country banks in the speculative centers, and I would substitute sound banking for the method here proposed of what amounts to a government guaranty.

I believe that this bill will do more harm than it will do good. Whatever may be the vicissitudes of our financial organizations, there is an absolute trust in the responsibility of the Government itself. That trust will be diminished if the Government of the United States puts itself under obligation to respond upon call to so large a demand as $500,000,000. Why is it that our government bonds are all time bonds, running ten, twenty, and thirty years? It is because the Government must have time within which it can shape measures, can shape taxation, can shape its finances to meet its obligations when they are due. The position of any man or of any corporation or any government that has to respond at a moment of time to a large amount of call obligations is precarious. This bill provides that the Government shall borrow from the postal depositors on call, and loan, practically, to the banks on time, so that the money which is received will be necessarily locked up and will not be ready for use in time of emergency. It will be borrowed on call, and on the call of a class of people admittedly timid, and loaned on time to the banks of the country; for, while that may not be the terms of the obligation, it will, in fact, be the obligation; for, when the time of the emergency comes, the Government will be afraid to call upon the banks for this $500,000,000, lest it prostrate the finances of the entire country.

There is another objection that I have to this bill. If the Government is to borrow on call and loan on time, it is essential that it should have every security. This bill as it is amended provides that the Government shall deposit these funds not only in the national banks, over which it has supervision and control, but in state banks, over which it has no supervision and control. I would not deposit a dollar of the Government's money in any bank save the bank that is created by the Government, and is subject to its supervision, direction, and control.

It is true that the state banks in this country are now outnumbering the national banks; it is true that the deposits in the state banks are exceeding those in the national banks; but why is it? It is because the laws with reference to state banking, as a rule, impose less restraints upon the owners of the banks than do the national-bank laws. Look at the statistics, and you will find that whilst the deposits in the state banks of this country aggregate considerably over $5,000,000,000 and the deposits in national banks aggregate a little under $5,000,000,000, the state banks have in ready cash on hand only $426,000,000, or 8 per cent of their deposit obligations, whilst the national banks have in ready cash $926,000,000, or nearly 20 per cent.

The state banks are permitted by the laws of the various States to conduct business with reserves grossly inadequate in the average, according to all the established rules of banking. I do not mean to say that this applies to all state banks. Some state banks are under proper control as to capital and as to reserve; but the statistics show that, on the average, state banks have only 8 per cent of cash to meet their depositors' obligations, whilst the national banks, on an average, have 20 per cent.

Now, if you are going to include the state banks as the beneficiaries of this bill and provide that these moneys shall be deposited with them, it is only wise that you should insist that they should come under national supervision and control in the matter of reserves and the relation of capital to loans.

What does safe banking require? Safe banking requires that no bank should be permitted to loan out more than $5 of its depositors' money to every dollar of its capital, because the capital is the ultimate security of the depositors, and the margin should be at least 20 per cent; and it also requires that every bank should hold in its vaults subject to the check of its depositors at least 20 per cent in cash.

If you will look over the statistics you will find that many of the state banks do not come up to this rule as to capital, and few of them come up to this rule as to reserves. The state trust companies, which of late years have so trenched upon the business of the national banks, have in many notable cases done a commercial business upon a 3 per cent cash reserve.

Now, Mr. President, we are only treating symptoms when we pass such a bill as this. Our whole financial system requires reorganization. The Monetary Commission is at work on it; but, instead of doing the things that are easily within reach and doing them quickly, it is bent upon a work that is almost impossible of successful accomplishment, and that, too, an accomplishment which, in the present condition of finance and of speculative control of banks, would be undesirable.

There is just one thing that has characterized the action of Congress with reference to the national banks under the leadership of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] as chairman of the Finance Committee, and that has been, legislation tending not to the security of the depositors, but to the increase of the credit facilities of the banks. Look over the whole history of the Finance Committee, under the direction and control of its present chairman, and you will find no measure tending to increase the security of depositors and all legislation tending to increase the credit issues of the bank. Yet, as a matter of fact, we are suffering in this country to-day from too large a money volume and too large issues of credit. The result has been this rise in prices which is felt by all, and which is declaimed against in every household in the country.

The amount of gold in this country has doubled in ten years. From about $700,000,000 in 1899 it has increased to nearly $1,400,000,000 in 1909. That alone would be an inflation amounting to 100 per cent in our basic money, whilst the population has increased less than 20 per cent. That inflation alone would cheapen the dollar and raise the value of everything that the dollar measured; but, under the inspiration of our financial legislation, the banks have been enabled to add to this inflation caused by the increase of basic money the inflation caused by increasing the credit facilities of the banks, and we find that, as compared with ten years ago, the loans of national and state banks, exclusive of savings banks, equaled $10,000,000,000 in 1909, whilst ten years ago they were only $5,000,000,000. In addition to this, the national banks have been permitted by liberal legislation to increase the issue of national-bank notes from $237,000,000 in 1899 to $685,000,000 in 1909, and these notes are covered by only 5 per cent in gold, held in the redemption fund. And so it is that, although we have during the past ten years been going through a period of increased production of gold unprecedented in the history of the world, we have been increasing also our substitute money until to-day the United States has in its greenbacks and in its national-bank notes more uncovered paper money than any country in the world.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What does the Senator suggest as an improvement? Would he contract the currency and reduce the circulating medium or curtail the coinage of gold, or what suggestion does the Senator have as a remedy for the increase in prices caused by this inflation? That is a subject to which I think too little attention is paid at this time, when there is a disposition to complain of increasing prices. Are we to remedy it by reducing the circulating medium and limiting the coinage of gold? What suggestion has the Senator to make?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator shortly, after I conclude the statement in which I was engaged.

I called attention to the fact that within ten years the basic money—gold—had increased about $700,000,000 in this country, and that during that period the uncovered paper money had been increased about $400,000,000, and the loans given by the commercial banks—national and state—had increased $5,000,000,000. That $5,000,000,000 of loans has the efficiency of money, for the bank loan is turned into the bank deposit and the depositor to whom the credit is given can check against it, by every check practically adding to the money volume of the country.

The Senator from South Dakota asked me what I would do. In the first place, I would take steps gradually, not immediately or rudely, to check this extraordinary issue of credit by the banks, and I would check it by compelling the banks to keep in their vaults a larger reserve, responsive to the demand of their depositors. To-day we have in all the commercial banks less than $1,400,000,000 in cash, and their obligations to their depositors aggregate over $10,000,000,000. We thus have an average cash reserve in the state banks and the national banks of about 13 per cent.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, does the Senator consider that it is a bad condition of affairs for the banks all over the country, both state and national, to be loaded down with currency and with deposits? Would the Senator improve the condition by having less funds in those banks to the credit of depositors?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misapprehends me. I do not propose to diminish by one dollar the volume of real money in this country, but I would take such action as would either compel the national banks to gradually cover their paper money with actual gold to be obtained from the increased production or to gradually retire their uncovered notes, which under existing conditions have been put out for inflation and not for necessary service; and I would compel the national banks, and also the state banks engaged in interstate commerce, to gradually strengthen their reserves by drawing into their vaults the new coin which comes from the increased production of gold, amounting in this country to $100,000,000 annually, and which otherwise would be employed as the basis of increasing the bank loans to the extent of over $500,000,000 annually, for the Senator knows that under the system of bank loans every dollar in the banks' vaults has the efficiency of $5 or more in the exchanges through the bank loan and deposit and check system. I would restrain future inflation gradually by compelling the banks to increase their reserves, which would absorb for a considerable period the current production of gold in this country and tend to prevent that gold from unduly inflating and raising prices, and I would make the increased gold a bulwark of security to the depositors in the banks, strengthening their confidence in the ability of the banks in any emergency to respond to their checks, and thus diminishing the chance of bank runs and bank panics.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is equivalent, is it not, I would ask the Senator, to contracting the currency; that is, by taking it out of circulation and fixing it in a stationary way as a reserve in the banks? So that, after all, the Senator's remedy is a contraction of the currency.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It does not involve a contraction of the currency. It simply takes the new gold, which is being produced in this country at the rate of $100,000,000 annually, and compels the banks to take that money and put it into their cash reserves, as against their deposit obligations and as a bulwark of security to the depositors themselves.

Will the Senator claim that an average reserve of 13 per cent is sufficient as a security to depositors? Will he claim that a cash reserve of 8 per cent, which is the average cash reserve of the various state banks in the country, is a sufficient security for depositors? If so, why does he not introduce a bill to reduce the reserves required in the national-bank act from 25 per cent in the reserve cities and from 15 per cent in the country banks to 8 per cent? If we are to have reserves, reserves necessarily imply that the money itself must be in the banks. It is not inert, however, for every dollar of cash in a bank enables that bank to issue at least $5 of credit, under the system that I speak of, in the shape of bank loans; and thus every dollar put into a bank has an efficiency of $5 in the exchanges of the country.

All I urge is that you should bulwark the deposit and check system by a sufficient requirement of cash reserves to meet the demands of depositors. What is it that alarms depositors? Are depositors satisfied with the statements that go out that the average loss of all the banks is the infinitesimal part of 1 per cent in a given time? No. Every depositor wants to feel that his money is there responsive to his call, and if he has the least doubt about it, whatever belief he may have about the ultimate security of the money, he wants to get it out, and hence it is necessary to have a large amount of cash always on hand to meet the current checks of the depositors, and it must be sufficient for an emergency. It is a universal rule of good banking that from 20 to 30 per cent is a safe cash reserve for banks.

We in this country have gone to the other extreme, and it accounts for the extraordinary inflation of credit and the extraordinary inflation of prices in this country, for we have had not only the inflation which has reached throughout the world, caused by the increased production of gold, but we have also had the additional inflation from which other countries have not suffered to the same degree—that is, the inflation of the credit system of the banks by which we have put thousands of credit mills to work, practically establishing a currency of their own, and we are beginning to feel the effects of it in an increase of prices that is disorganizing every business; that makes the common denominator, the thing that measures all other values, 30 per cent less in value than it was some years ago, and which has correspondingly raised the price, as compared with it, of all the products that money measures.

It is this of which we complain. It is this that, if continued, is going to bring about a readjustment between the laborers of the country and the employers of the country, a readjustment that will be accompanied by all kinds of violence and distress, unless we by wise and precautionary measures meet the question and restrain this inflation of credit and bring it within true and just proportions.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply desire to say——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to state to the Senator that I do not desire to contract.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will gladly listen to the Senator. I want to disabuse the Senator's mind of one thing. I do not want to contract anything. I do not want to contract the existing volume of money. I do not want to contract the existing volume of credits. I know as well to-day as anyone that if you diminish the credits of $10,000,000,000 extended by the banks to-day even $500,000,000 it would create a paralysis of trade throughout the country. All I wish to do is to restrain further inflation, and I would do that not by contracting the existing volume of money, not by contracting the existing volume of credits, but by putting cash behind the deposits and utilizing the extraordinary output of gold in a way that will add to the security of business throughout the country without impairing values. I would check the rise of prices. I would not by a revolutionary process bring about a readjustment and destruction of prices.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply wish to say to the Senator further, if he will permit me, that I am glad indeed he has been so frank in stating what I believe the people are fast coming to observe and believe; that is, that this very marked increase in the production of gold, the very marked increase in circulating medium, and the extension of credits by the banks, constitute the real reason for the increase in prices.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course, I understand the purpose of the Senator's query. He is glad that I am in a measure substantiating the claim of the Republican party that the increase in prices is largely due——

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator will excuse me. Not at all. I simply make the statement, coming naturally from one who has arrived at that conclusion as an individual and without any reference whatever to partisanship. I think it is too serious a question to be treated from the standpoint of cheap party politics, and it is too serious to the American people, and the sooner we get to the real truth about the matter and treat it intelligently the better it will be for us.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I accept the Senator's statement and simply say that I am perfectly willing to admit that the larger proportion of the increase in prices which has taken place in this country is due to the increase in the money volume, but still more due to the increase of the credits created by the banks. But they are not responsible entirely for the high prices in this country. There are other factors, and among them is the high protective tariff, which as to the protected articles raises a wall against foreign products on the average 45 per cent high, and cuts them out from domestic competition, thus giving our producers within the tariff wall, by means of combination, the opportunity of raising the prices of the commodities which they produce above the normal level of the world's prices. I do not mean to minimize at all the effect of the tariff as a factor of high prices, but I contend and I believe that every candid man who has made a study of this subject will be forced to the conclusion that the larger portion of this increase of prices is due to the increase in the money volume, and still more due to the bank credits issued by the credit mills which have been organized throughout the country, in many cases with insufficient capital and with insufficient reserves, and which have been grinding out credits that have the full efficiency of actual cash itself in the transactions of the country, in promoting activities, in creating demand, and raising prices.

Mr. MONEY rose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

RECESS.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, the hour is growing quite late; it is evident the bill can not be concluded at this sitting; and I beg to suggest to the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], in charge of the bill, that he move that the Senate take another recess, and let the bill go over until to-morrow. If it suits his convenience to do that, it will suit the convenience of a great many others.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, so far as I am concerned, that I have concluded.

Mr. MONEY. I did not refer to the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. I very much regret that the bill can not be disposed of to-night, apparently, unless by a very protracted session. I am informed that some six or eight Senators desire to make remarks on the bill, and many desire to offer amendments not heretofore presented; and in view of the conditions

I move that the Senate stand in recess until 11.45 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MONEY. One moment. I was not aware that the Senator from Nevada had not concluded his remarks. He only yielded to me, as he thought, for some question; and if we do take a recess, I hope he will have the floor when the Senate meets again. I want that distinctly understood.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Nevada desires to continue his remarks now, I will withdraw the motion, and will renew it at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. MONEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not care to say anything further.

Mr. CARTER. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have concluded.

Mr. CARTER. Then I renew the motion that the Senate stand in recess until 11.45 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 5, 1910, at 11.45 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 4, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSTRUCTION OF VESSELS ON GREAT LAKES.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] presents the following report (No. 674) from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 385.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House of Representatives the following information:

First. What bids have been received at any time by the Navy Department from shipbuilders on the Great Lakes for the construction of vessels, or parts thereof, and a comparison of these bids with bids for the same work from shipbuilders on the seaboard.

Second. The maximum dimensions of vessels that can now pass through intervening locks between the Great Lakes and the seaboard.

Third. To what extent naval vessels, or parts thereof, could be constructed in the shipyards on the Great Lakes in case the present obstacles to such construction should be removed.

Fourth. What are the obstacles in the way of construction of vessels, or parts thereof, on the Great Lakes. What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government to remove these obstacles.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, the attention of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department has been called to the fact that the Navy Department is now deprived of the benefit of competition of the lake shipyards in the construction of those vessels of the navy which can go through the canals. The Government is also deprived of the benefit of this competition in the construction of many parts of the larger vessels, such as armor plate, which could be constructed in the lake yards and brought through the canals. The probable reason why bids lower than those on the seaboard have been rejected is the old Rush-Bagot convention, and I do not wish to take the time of the House now to go into the full history or account of this agreement. Suffice it to say, when that agreement was made between the two countries there were no canals, and therefore there was no way of getting from the Lakes to the seaboard. The exact language of this agreement is that no armed vessels except the ones authorized shall be built or armed on the Lakes. At the time this agreement was made to build on the Lakes necessarily meant to maintain on the Lakes, whereas by the construction of the canals smaller vessels can now be taken through to the tide water.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How could you build these vessels on the Lakes as long as that treaty or agreement is in force?

Mr. BOUTELL. I just stated that I supposed the reason that would be given would be that this treaty was in force, and that is the exact reason for asking for this information. This treaty has been nominally in force from the year 1818; but, as a matter of fact, the letter of this convention has been violated many times. It has been violated in the maintenance on the Lakes of the old gunboat Michigan, now called the Wolverine, which I will take up in another resolution. I may say the letter of the convention has been violated in maintaining on the Lakes the large gunboats owned by the Government for the use of the naval militia, and these exceptions to the Rush-Bagot convention have doubtless been agreed to, just as the convention itself was agreed to, by executive correspondence between the two Governments.

Now, then, what the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department wants to find out is this: Whether these bids have simply been rejected, when money could be saved by accepting them, without any attempt at negotiation with the other contracting parties for the construction of those vessels.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the intention of the resolution to cut down expenses and save the Government some money?

Mr. BOUTELL. It is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. Do you hold that this convention that you are talking about, and about which you wrote a very interesting article in some magazine several years ago, has been abrogated by the act of the two Governments, or is it still in force?

Mr. BOUTELL. That convention is still in force. It has been abrogated by the two Governments, not fully, but through suspension, exceptions have been made to the agreement by correspondence between the two parties; and the object of this resolution, if adopted, is simply to get information. When we get the information the committee will be able to report to the House some line of procedure looking to the saving of money and putting the lake shipyards on an equality with the seaboard shipyards in the construction of the smaller boats and armor plate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Your resolution seems to assume that you can build these vessels out on the Lakes cheaper than on the seaboard?

Mr. BOUTELL. That is the information we ask for. The committee has had intimations that bids have been made at shipyards on the lakes lower than shipyards on the seaboard, for the same character of work.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. What facilities have the Navy Department or the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of ascertaining whether war vessels can be built in shipyards on the Great Lakes? Will not that require a very extended investigation at considerable expense on the part of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BOUTELL. I do not think that this resolution calls for anything that requires any expense. They have in the Navy Department at all times full information as to the character of all the private shipyards in the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the convention forbid the maintenance of more than two gunboats on the Lakes, and does it not also forbid the construction of any naval vessel there?

Mr. BOUTELL. The exact terms of the Rush-Bagot convention are these: It was agreed to in 1818, when there were still afloat on Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, and Lake Champlain several old vessels which engaged in the war of 1812. The Rush-Bagot convention was a most beneficent agreement for the two Governments. It was an agreement for disarmament and a pledge of perpetual peace. It provided that each Government should maintain on Lake Ontario a vessel of 100 tons burden, with one 18-pound gun; one such vessel on Lake Champlain and two such vessels on the upper Lakes. It further provided that no other war vessels should be built or armed on the Lakes, and the point that I make is this: That in 1818, when there were no canals, to build on the Lakes necessarily was to maintain on the Lakes. It takes us into a very interesting, and, I may say, a romantic chapter of our history and our diplomatic relations. This is a case where the construction of canals has entirely altered the meaning of a great international convention.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The third item in the resolution reads:

Third. To what extent naval vessels, or parts thereof, could be constructed in the shipyards on the Great Lakes in case the present obstacles to such construction should be removed.

Is my colleague able to state whether the Navy Department has information which will permit it to answer the question, without making a thorough investigation anew of the shipyards on the Lakes?

Mr. BOUTELL. It is the understanding of the Committee on Expenditures that the Navy Department now has all this information in detail as to all the private shipyards on the Lakes.

Mr. MANN. May I make one suggestion to my colleague? The resolution says—

That the Secretary of the Navy be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest.

The House on two former resolutions addressed to the Secretary of the Navy declined to insert the words—

If not incompatible with the public interest.

Because it is not the practice of either House of Congress in requiring or asking for information from the head of a department, as distinguished from the President or as distinguished from the Secretary of State on diplomatic matters, to insert that provision; but it is the practice of the House to direct the head of the department to furnish the information. Has my colleague any objection to having the resolution amended so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the House of Representatives the following information.

Mr. BOUTELL. I dislike very much to differ with the gentleman from Illinois on a question of rhetoric or interpretation. My idea is that the word "request" is the language of courtesy, and between the departments of the Government the language of courtesy is just as persuasive and compelling as the language of insistence.

Mr. MANN. I will not dispute that, except that it has been the practice, as a rule, for Congress to direct the head of a department to furnish information, assuming that Congress has the right to require information to be furnished, and that is the general practice. In the body at the other end of the Capitol they are extremely particular about it, as it seems to me with good reason. If my colleague will refer to the history of the rules of the House, he will find that in reference to this character of resolution the rule formerly provided that it should "direct" the head of a department; and when the change was made in the rules that direction was not stricken out, for the purpose of avoiding that provision.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will say to my colleague that the language of this resolution was inserted in its present form in accordance with the spirit of the very exception to which he refers.

This matter of the Rush-Bagot convention and its operation has been before the foreign offices of the two Governments for lo these many years, and the Joint High Commission, if it is still in existence, has this question under consideration. And it occurred to the committee, as it involved the possible interpretation of a treaty, and as it, furthermore, involved the negotiations pending between the two Governments, that this language, in entire harmony with the spirit of my colleague's suggestion, was the exact language proper to be kept in this resolution.

Mr. MANN. But my colleague will admit that this resolution only asks from the Navy Department information concerning bids, the dimension of vessels that can pass through the Welland Canal, and as to shipyards on the Great Lakes, none of which have anything whatever to do with the convention between this country and Great Britain, and the information asked for is said to be information in the hands of the Navy Department, which we are entitled to have, regardless of the convention.

Mr. BOUTELL. If my colleague will turn over the sheet and look at page 2 of the resolution, he will find under the fourth heading the following:

Fourth. What are the obstacles in the way of construction of vessels, or parts thereof, on the Great Lakes? What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government to remove these obstacles?

That is the matter which brings this within the exception to which the gentleman refers, and I think he will agree with me that the resolution ought to remain in its present shape. If there are any negotiations pending which would lead the Secretary of the Navy to think it would not be compatible with the public interest to give them at this time, this gives him an opportunity to say so.

Mr. MANN. The fourth paragraph had escaped my attention entirely. Of course it removes this resolution from the privileged class; and if I had heard that read in the first place I think I would have had to make a point of order against it.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, upon the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois as to the ability of these shipyards, located on the Lakes, to compete in building, I wish to say for his information that there is located in my own district, in the harbor city of Lorain, Ohio, on Lake Erie, one of the best equipped shipyards to be found anywhere in the United States.

That shipyard to-day is turning out at the rate of 10 to 15 Great Lake freight carriers that rival in size the very largest ocean steamer, having a tonnage capacity of from 10,000 to 12,000 tons. By improved methods they can turn out these great boats at the end of six or eight weeks, and it has occurred to me for several years past that the treaty obligations ought to be abrogated whereby the building of these great boats on the Lakes is prevented.

A strong reason why the shipyards on the Great Lakes can compete with the shipyards along the ocean lines is that we get the raw material much cheaper. The ore is sent down without breaking bulk or package, and the other material is shipped up to meet it. So, as a matter of fact I presume, offhand, that these large boats can be constructed at the shipyards at Lorain full 20 per cent cheaper than at the ocean shipyards.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

GUNBOAT "WOLVERINE."

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 384.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House of Representatives the following information:

First. An account of the construction and repairs of the gunboat Wolverine on the Great Lakes.

Second. The duties now performed by this vessel.

Third. The number of officers and crew.

Fourth. How many months, on the average, this vessel is out of commission in each year.

Fifth. What services are performed by the officers and crew when the vessel is laid up.

Sixth. The annual expense of maintaining this vessel.

Seventh. What duties are now performed by this vessel.

Eighth. Whether the public interest would suffer in any way by discontinuing the services of this vessel on the Great Lakes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not a privileged resolution. It asks for the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELL. I trust that the gentleman from New York will reserve the point of order, so that the resolution may be explained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois is asking to have it considered as a privileged matter. If it is not privileged it ought not to be considered now. There are claim bills which can be occupying the time of the House.

Mr. BOUTELL. This is a resolution looking to saving the Government $100,000 a year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman can get the resolution up under the rules of the House. He can put it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. If by unanimous consent this point of order can temporarily be passed to enable one or two other gentlemen to call up alleged privileged resolutions, the Chair would be glad to have it passed. The Chair is having the precedents examined. Without objection, this resolution will be temporarily laid aside.

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION OF A GUNBOAT ON THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged resolution. (Report No. 675.)

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 386.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House of Representatives the following information:

First. Why is not the appropriation for the construction of a gunboat on the Great Lakes, contained in the naval appropriation act of 1898, expended?

Second. What steps, if any, have been taken by the United States Government to remove the obstacles that prevented the construction of this vessel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "requested, if not incompatible with the public interest," and insert in lieu thereof the word "directed."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the first paragraph of the resolution strike out the words "requested, if not incompatible with the public interest," and insert in lieu thereof the word "directed."

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to oppose the amendment, and sincerely trust that it will be voted down. I quite appreciate what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says about the form of the resolution. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that this resolution, of the three that I have just presented, comes specially within the exception mentioned by the gentleman. The naval appropriation act of 1898 for the year 1899 contained a provision for the expenditure of $260,000 for the building of a small modern gunboat on the Great Lakes. Quoting from memory, it contained this provision, "Provided this does not contravene any existing treaty or convention."

Now, what the Committee on Expenditures want to bring out for the benefit of the House is what, if anything, had been done to see whether the wishes of Congress could be carried out under that old convention. So I think the language in this resolution ought to stand as it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, I wish to make a brief statement. The uniform practice of the House has been "to request the President of the United States" for information and "to direct the heads of executive departments" to give information. The House has always asserted its right as the popular branch of the legislature to compel heads of departments to furnish information in the transaction of its business. If this resolution be designed to obtain information relating to our diplomatic relations, it is addressed to the wrong person. The Secretary of the Navy is not in a position to give information of that character.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, would the gentleman from Illinois accept an amendment, and would the gentleman from New York accept a suggestion, that the resolution be addressed to the President if not incompatible, and so forth?

Mr. BOUTELL. I will say that a resolution of this sort directed to the President is in effect a resolution directed to one of the departments for information. The information asked for must come from the Secretary of the Navy, and I see nothing to be gained by burdening the President with these problems at the present time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me finish what I was saying.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman from New York is in error as to the person to whom this resolution should be directed. The act of 1898 directed the Secretary of the Navy to spend this money, provided it did not contravene any existing treaty or convention. Let me once more make explicit the point which I thought I had made clear to the House, that we do not wish the Navy Department to stand in its refusal to build this boat on the Great Lakes, or to refuse to accept bids upon it, upon the mere letter of the convention. We want the Navy Department to get into correspondence with the other contracting party just as it did when it sent the Dorothea and the Franklin to the Great Lakes in contravention of the letter of this convention. So, in accordance with the first resolution, we want to know whether the Navy Department has declined to accept lower bids on the Great Lakes simply on account of the letter of this agreement or whether it has attempted by correspondence to secure a modification which would enable the Government to save this money. Therefore, in this resolution we want from the Secretary of the Navy his report as to what the Navy Department has done respecting the carrying out of the will of Congress, if giving that information is not incompatible with the general welfare.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest again to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] that, from what he now says, he will not obtain any information that will be of any value. The only action the Navy Department could take would be, in following the usual routine, to ascertain from the Department of State what representations were made to the British Empire or the Canadian government, whichever is the proper way—and I understand it is to the foreign office of Great Britain—seeking to abrogate this agreement. The Secretary of the Navy has not in his possession information showing what has been done by the other department. It seems to me that if the House itself does not insist upon its right to command these officials to furnish information to which the House is entitled, these officials will not be very likely to treat the House with the respect that the House insists it should receive. The universal practice—and it will be found by examining Hinds's Precedents—is "to request the President" to furnish information and "to direct" all other officials to furnish information to the House. There can not be anything so sacred about any negotiations that might have been conducted in this instance as to keep it from the public. If negotiations have been conducted about this matter, and if it be necessary for the House to have the information, it should command the heads of the various departments to furnish the information to the House. It seems to me that, in view of the universal practice and the facts desired, the House should adopt this form in this instance as well as in all others.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. KEIFER. I thought the gentleman from New York had concluded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Very well; I am through.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. BOUTELL. With pleasure.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is there any doubt about the fact that the construction of a gunboat on the the Great Lakes to be kept there being in violation of an existing treaty between this country and Great Britain?

Mr. BOUTELL. Well, the second resolution that I introduced called for information in reference to one gunboat, the construction of which is in contravention of the treaty; one gunboat, which has a tonnage equal to the tonnage of the four vessels authorized to be maintained on the Lakes by the treaty.

Mr. KEIFER. Has it not been arranged between the two countries as to that one, and would not this be in violation of the treaty?

Mr. BOUTELL. If we receive full information respecting the second resolution which I introduced, to which a point of order was made and which I do not think will hold good, we will have before the House in accurate form all the information which the gentleman asks for.

Mr. KEIFER. I notice that the second paragraph of this joint resolution reads:

> What steps, if any, have been taken by the United States Government to remove the obstacles that prevent the construction of this vessel?

Seeing that it would look as though we are asking the Navy Department to find out, probably through the Secretary of State, what sort of negotiations are going on and how they are progressing, which might be very serious in that it might prevent the very object that is sought, to wit, to have an agreement on the subject. Therefore I say that it is highly important that that clause in the resolution, which reads "if not incompatible with the public interest," should be left in the resolution so as not to endanger any negotiation that may be now progressing.

Mr. BOUTELL. I quite agree with the gentleman from Ohio, and I think a little reflection and a complete understanding of the nature of these resolutions will commend his opinion to the judgment of every Member of the House.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES. Is it in order to move to amend, pending the amendment of the gentleman from New York, by striking out, in line 1, the words "Secretary of the Navy" and inserting the words "President of the United States?"

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman had the floor, it would be in order, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has the floor.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman from New York announced, Mr. Speaker, that he had concluded his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Well, then the Chair——

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GAINES. Then the gentleman will lose his resolution.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from New York yield the floor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I offered an amendment and yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from Illinois had yielded——

Mr. BOUTELL. I had yielded to the gentleman from New York to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman lost the floor when the gentleman from New York offered his amendment.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out, in line 1, the words "Secretary of the Navy" and insert "President of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Line 1, strike out the words "Secretary of the Navy" and insert "President of the United States."

The SPEAKER. And the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the resolution will be adopted in the form in which it is before the House, and I now move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under the impression that the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia was in the nature of an amendment to the amendment, but on examination it seems to be a separate and independent amendment. Is there objection to both amendments being——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. GAINES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. GAINES. I desire to know the parliamentary status.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question upon the amendments and the resolution to its final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken upon the amendment first offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 1, strike out the words "Secretary of the Navy" and insert "President of the United States."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seem to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BOUTELL) there were—ayes 101, noes 66.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the adoption of that amendment, I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw the other amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from New York withdraws his amendment. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

GUNBOAT "WOLVERINE."

The SPEAKER. As to the resolution (H. Res. 384) that was laid aside by unanimous consent, a point of order pending to the same on the ground that the eighth specification called for an expression of opinion, and which reads as follows:

Whether the public interests would suffer in any way by discontinuing the services of this vessel on the Great Lakes.

The constructions of the rule touching these resolutions have been substantially uniform. The Chair reads from Hinds's Precedents (vol. 3, sec. 1872) from a resolution that was held not to be privileged:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish to Congress a report—and his opinion as to whether or not this investigation should be continued.

While the word "opinion" is not used in this section 8, yet really an opinion is asked, and in the view of the Chair it destroys the privilege of the resolution, and the point of order is sustained. The resolution will go upon the calendar.

CLAIMS.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all private bills in order for to-day under the rule may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all private bills in order to-day under the rule may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman make that all bills not objected to?

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to my colleague I will say I have prepared such a motion. I have consulted with a very high authority on parliamentary procedure, and he suggested that I amend my request in accordance with the suggestion I made.

I wish to say to my colleague that I do not wish to press any bills that are objected to, and I am frank to say if objections are made I will lay them aside and go on.

Mr. MANN. I understood it was intended to occupy an hour or so possibly on the Private Calendar. There are some bills on the calendar where there are minority reports, or where there is an adverse report, and the House does not want to take those bills up to-day, whereas, under the gentleman's motion, the House might get into controversy over one of those bills and not make much headway on the other ones.

Mr. PRINCE. I would gladly make any motion along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Illinois if it be in order. I will say to him, however, and to the House that if any bill is presented that the chairman of the Committee on Claims has any control over and objection is made to it, I will have it passed without prejudice and go on.

Mr. MANN. But the chairman has no control over it. I suggest that the gentleman make his request to consider those bills to which objection is not made when reached. In that way he can clear up unobjected bills, and most of them are not objected to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] modify his request?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes. I now ask unanimous consent that all bills in order to-day, when reached, to which there is no objection, may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that bills in order to-day on the Private Calendar, that are not objected to, may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] whether the exception to which he refers would exclude the consideration of bills on which minority views have been filed?

Mr. PRINCE. It would, sir.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In other words, the——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the request, namely, that bills on the calendar in order to-day shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, but that if any bill when reached is objected to it shall not be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Which, Mr. Speaker, would preclude the consideration to-day of bills to which any Member might object?

The SPEAKER. It would after the unobjected bills had been gone through.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. PRINCE. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar under the rules of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. GAINES in the chair.

J. A. DENNY.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I call up the first bill on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9447) for the relief of J. A. Denny.

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to abate a tax of $669.76 on distilled spirits assesed against J. A. Denny, proprietor of grain distillery No. 2793, located at Triplett, N. C., in the year 1895.

Mr. PRINCE. This is a bill which received very careful consideration by the Committee on Claims in the Sixtieth Congress, and on February 12, 1909, it made a favorable report to the House upon the bill. The committee this year have gone over the papers again, and under date of January 19, 1910, have again favorably reported this bill to the Committee of the Whole House. We have a letter under date of January 24, 1910, giving the amount of the loss by reason of the total destruction of the distillery by fire, and we believe it is a just and meritorious claim and ought to receive prompt and favorable consideration by Congress.

If there are no questions, I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN H. M'BRAYER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11821) for the relief of John H. McBrayer.

The bill was read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11821) for the relief of John H. McBrayer.

Whereas on June 27, 1894, suits were instituted in the United States district court at Louisville, Ky., by the United States Government against John H. McBrayer, John S. Price, and Peter Routt, as sureties on the bonds of Ballard D. Hawkins and Jasper R. Hawkins, distillers, located in Anderson County, Ky. (said judgments are numbered 4908, 4909, 4910, 4911, 4912, 4913, 4914, 4915, 4954, and 5285); and that judgments by default were entered in said suits in February and November, 1895; and

Whereas the other sureties on said bonds, Price and Routt, are both insolvent, as are also the principals on said bonds; and

Whereas on September 10, 1893, the warehouse containing the whisky set out in said bonds was destroyed by fire and all the whisky consumed, and that by reason of the age and infirmities of said John H. McBrayer he was unable to give his personal attention to the defense of said suits, and by reason thereof judgments were rendered against him by default; and

Whereas he was not liable for the payment of any of the taxes for the whisky so destroyed by fire and for which said judgments were rendered, and the effort is now being made to collect them; and

Whereas by reason of section 3221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and as amended by act of March 1, 1879, said judgments are unjust, the Government is not entitled in good conscience to collect from John H. McBrayer said judgments or any part thereof: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General of the United States are, or either of them is, authorized to cause to be entered as satisfied the judgments aforesaid, and that said John H. McBrayer be, and he is hereby, released from further liability on said bonds.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, the committee offers the following amendment, not as to the merits of the bill at all, but as to the form of it. There are so many "whereases" that it hardly makes it in the form of a bill.

Amend by striking out all on the first page, beginning at "Whereas on June 27," etc., and all the recitals in said bill following thereafter down to and including "Therefore," on the second page of said bill, and inserting, after the word "judgments," in line 5, on page 2 of said bill, the following: "of record in the office of the United States district court at Louisville, Ky., in the cases of the United States Government against John H. McBrayer, John S. Price, and Peter Routt, as sureties on the bonds of Ballard D. Hawkins and Jasper R. Hawkins, said judgments being Nos. 4908, 4909, 4910, 4911, 4912, 4913, 4914, 4915, 4954, and 5285," and also striking out in said line on said page the word "aforesaid," so that said bill, when so amended, shall read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General of the United States are, or either of them is, authorized to cause to be entered as satisfied the judgments of record in the office of the United States district court at Louisville, Ky., in the cases of the United States Government against John H. McBrayer, John S. Price, and Peter Routt, as sureties on the bonds of Ballard D. Hawkins and Jasper R. Hawkins, said judgments being Nos. 4908, 4909, 4910, 4911, 4912, 4913, 4914, 4915, 4954, and 5285, and that said John H. McBrayer be, and he is hereby, released from further liability on said bonds."

Mr. CAMPBELL rose.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, just a moment until I state the amendment, and then I will yield. This seeks to release from liability upon bond upon which judgments were had on January 27, 1894, in the United States district court at Louisville, Ky. This bill for relief came first in the Fifty-ninth Congress. It was introduced in the Sixtieth Congress. In February, 1909, at the second session of the Sixtieth Congress, the Committee on Claims made a favorable report upon this bill. The present committee, under date of January 19, 1910, also make a favorable report upon this bill. There is printed a full report, which gives all the facts connected with it. It is a loss by reason of the burning of a warehouse. Now, if there are any further questions desired by anyone in the committee I will yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether or not there was service on this claimant from the United States court in which the judgments were entered?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There was no service on Mr. McBrayer, the gentleman who asks this release. Judgment was taken against him by the court. He was an old man, probably 82 or 83 years of age, and paid no attention to the matter, and judgments were taken against him by default.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But how could the court render a judgment without service?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I take it for granted that he was served.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It seems very strange that a man of the business ability of Mr. McBrayer should permit a judgment to be entered against him by default.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In response to that, Mr. Chairman, I should say that a man over 80 years of age could scarcely be called a good business man. I am told by the gentleman from Kentucky that he was not a specially good business man.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He was doing a large business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; he was not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He was engaged in the whisky distillery business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that my information is that he was surety upon the bonds of a man who was engaged in distilling whisky. The other man's distillery burned. Suit was brought against the sureties to compel them to pay the tax on the whisky that was burned. Now, then, judgment by default went against this old man. The others were all insolvent, and as a matter of fact the internal-revenue laws exempt where the loss is by unavoidable casualty. That was this loss—a loss by fire.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Aside from that, the question I want to know is was this claimant served with a summons in that court in the case——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not able to tell you.

Mr. CAMPBELL (continuing). Upon which the judgment was entered?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not tell about that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The first statement was that he was not served.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He may have been constructively served.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless there was express service, judgment could not be entered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It would be absolutely void if he was not served, and we ought not idly to relieve a man of a judgment that has been properly entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not said that he was not served.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If he was served, the judgment was regularly entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He could be relieved by the Secretary of the Treasury, except for limitation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Could not the court that entered the judgment, where notice was given, know whether there were any reasons why the man could not appear to answer the summons?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will say, in response to the gentleman from Kansas, that from the papers on file the fact that judgment was entered, I think, would warrant the assumption that he was properly served. But having been served, he made default, and a judgment was taken against him by default for the taxes levied against this whisky that had in fact been consumed by fire. Under the statutes of the United States they were entitled to be relieved from those taxes; but it has gone now to the form of a judgment, and the court has entered a stay until this complainant could appear here and apply for this relief. It is for that purpose that the bill was introduced.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the law of the United States, when whisky in a Government bonded warehouse is destroyed by unavoidable casualty, relief may be had by applying to the Secretary of the Treasury to have that tax abated. It is the invariable rule that as soon as one of these fires occurs the collector of internal revenue in whose district the loss is levies an assessment against the owners of the distillery for the tax on the whisky which was destroyed. That is the formal process. Then as soon as that assessment is levied the district attorney takes up the matter for suit, during the pendency of which the owner of the distillery may make application to the Secretary of the Treasury to have the tax abated. Now, this old man, who was only a surety upon the bond of this distiller, looked to the principal to see that he was released. The principal himself having been made insolvent by the fire, and the other two sureties being insolvent, the matter just simply went by default. This old man confidently expected his principal to take care of him, but he did not. He left him in the lurch. This is a case where the United States Government has no equitable claim against the party.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What evidence did the committee have that McBrayer made any effort whatever to find out whether a defense was being made in the case, and whether or not his rights were being protected in the courts?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not a member of the committee and can not answer that, except I understand that the report sets that out fully.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It looks to me very much as though this were a case where a litigant had lost out in the courts and was coming to Congress for the purpose of having the judgment of the court set aside.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For the reason that when this old man found out that his principal had not taken care of him, the limitation had run, and the Secretary of the Treasury can not furnish him the relief.

I will say to the gentleman that two similar fires have occurred in my district in the last eighteen months, each of these fires involving nearly a million dollars' loss, and the Secretary of the Treasury remitted the tax on the whisky that was destroyed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was any effort made by this claimant to have his loss adjusted and the judgment set aside in the court?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say I have a statement here signed by McBrayer, and if the gentleman wishes it, I will read it:

To the President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your petitioner, John H. McBrayer, states that he was born in Anderson County, Ky., on the 16th day of June, 1826, and is now 76 years of age; that when only 19 years of age he enlisted in the army to serve his country in the war with Mexico, and was promoted to be captain of Company K, Second Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, known as the "Salt River Tigers," before he reached the age of 21; that since his discharge from the army he has been engaged in business in this county at different times distilling, merchandising, and trading generally, and has served his people in the capacity of sheriff of the county; that as he grew older he was unfortunate in his investments and lost all that he had accumulated, except his little home, which is left to him, and one or two small tracts of land, which barely yield him a living for himself and his aged wife, who has been invalid for years.

He states that some time in 1892 or 1893 he, together with one John S. Price and Peter Routt, became surety on the warehousing bonds of Ballard D. and Jasper R. Hawkins, distillers, of this county; that afterwards, to wit, on September 10, 1893, the warehouse containing the whisky set out in said bonds was destroyed by fire and all of the whisky consumed; that on June 27, 1894, suits were brought on said bonds in the United States district court at Louisville, Ky., for the recovery of taxes on said whisky and penalties for nonpayment; that said judgments are numbered 4908, 4909, 4910, 4911, 4912, 4913, 4914, 4915, 4954, and 5285, and that judgments by default were taken thereon in February and November, 1895, said judgments amounting at the present time to the sum of $20,306.68, with $464.53 costs; that his cosureties, Price and Routt, are both insolvent, as are the principals in said bonds; that by reason of the disabilities incident to his great age he is absolutely unable to earn a support for himself and his invalid wife, and that in order to secure such living he has been compelled to rent a portion of his dwelling to roomers; that he is absolutely unable to pay said judgments, or any portion thereof, and that if they are enforced against him every dollar's worth of property which he now possesses will be taken from him and he will be reduced to absolute penury; that by far the greater part of his small property is now involved in litigation and can not now be subjected to this or any other debt, and that all of said property if sold would not pay more than 25 per cent of said judgments.

He further says that when said suits were first brought he employed counsel to represent him in said court, but that for some reason unknown to him said counsel did not appear when the judgments were taken, and that he was not informed of the sitting of the court and did not appear in person, and that he did not learn that judgments had been entered until it was too late for him to appeal therefrom or to petition for a rehearing. He says that he is advised that there is a provision in the Revised Statutes of the United States for the remission of taxes on whisky which may be burned in a bonded warehouse, and he most respectfully asks that the several judgments against him and others be remitted for the reasons above set out.

This November 11, 1902.

JNO. H. MCBRAYER.

We, the undersigned citizens of Anderson County, respectfully state that we have read the foregoing petition, and, from our personal knowledge of the petitioner, believe the statements therein to be true; that there is no more deserving person in our county than said petitioner, and we join in asking that the relief sought be extended to him.

G. W. WALKER, Clerk of Circuit Court.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There is not a lawyer in this House who does not know that if the facts set out in that statement had been stated to the court the court would have set aside the judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the application had been made in time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He says he employed counsel to represent him in that case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He also states that his counsel misrepresented him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He states that his counsel failed to appear for him in court. There is not a court in the United States that would not set aside a judgment that had been entered against a defendant under those circumstances in order to give him his day in court.

Mr. MANN. The court could not set aside the judgment after the term had expired, and probably would not set aside the judgment unless some defense was set up.

Now, let me see if I can not help the gentleman out of this. Unfortunately the committee probably did not refer this bill to the Treasury Department, as it should have been referred, and furnish us with a letter from the department covering the subject. I remember this case in days of old. This is not the first time this bill has been before the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I remember it very well. I think I was in the chair when it came up the last time.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I remember this case very well. It was before the committee when I was chairman. We did refer the matter to the Treasury Department, and the Treasury Department referred it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Yerkes, and Mr. Yerkes reported to the committee that the equities of the case were such that the party would have a right to receive the relief asked for.

Mr. MANN. I was about to state what had taken place. The claim has been referred to the Treasury Department. These are the facts in the case: Under the law, if it appeared to the Treasury Department, by sufficient legal evidence, that the distillery was destroyed and that the tax was unpaid on the liquor, the tax could be rebated under the law and the bond would be discharged. But there was in this case no legal evidence to show that this distillery was destroyed by accidental fire, and there was some question in reference to the cause of the fire. The Treasury Department, therefore, was not warranted, under the law, in compliance with the strict legal provisions, to cancel the bond or release the payment of the tax. But the Treasury Department believed that the tax ought not to be paid, and yet, in the ordinary course of business, the bonds were turned over to the district attorney, who commenced a suit. No one connected with these bonds thought that they should be enforced or the money collected. But in the course of time the district attorney obtained service and obtained a judgment by default. Those judgments are nearly 15 years old; some of them are over 15 years old.

The Treasury Department has never believed that it ought to collect the money. Although the Treasury Department itself did not have the authority under the strict interpretation of the law to cancel the judgment or to waive the payment of the tax, yet it has always advised that in all fairness under the spirit of the law the tax ought never to have been collected because the liquor was in fact destroyed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This old man wants the cloud removed from his title.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I want to call the attention of the committee to what Mr. Yerkes said. He said he was clearly of the opinion that in no way was this claimant responsible for the fire and loss following the fire, and that the equities were strongly in favor of granting him the relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EVAN M. JOHNSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14729) for the relief of Capt. Evan M. Johnson, United States Army.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Evan M. Johnson, United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,584, said sum to be payment in full for all losses of personal property incurred by him by reason of the sinking of the U. S. transport Meade in the harbor of Ponce, P. R., on or about March 24, 1902.

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

"Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury shall require a schedule and affidavit from him, such schedule to be approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "dollars," insert the following words: "and said sum of $1,584 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to pay Captain Johnson for loss of personal property incurred by him by reason of the sinking of the U. S. transport Meade in the harbor of Ponce, P. R., March 24, 1902. Three officers at that time lost property. Two of these officers in the last Congress were paid for their losses. This officer presented his claim too late to be considered by the committee in connection with the other two claims. There is a favorable report from the War Department, and this committee has reported it favorably to the House.

I am frank to say that the committee does not like this kind of claim. They do not like to be paying army and navy officers for the loss of property; they do not believe it proper that the United States should be an insurer of property; but they were confronted with these conditions: The three officers had lost property and two officers had been reimbursed for the loss of that property, and the loss covered by this bill occurred at one and the same time, and Congress has acted favorably in the case of two of the officers. I am frank to say that I believe the temper of the committee would be and is to-day that if it was not for these precedents we would not pay this claim, because we believe that there is hardly any class of men in the government service who are better paid and better taken care of in every conceivable way than the army and navy officers of this country.

I hope that if this should be approved, and I am in favor of this bill, the committee will at least hereafter state to these officers, in effect, "You receive good pay, you receive an allowance, you are paid for transportation of your goods from your home to the warehouse, your goods are packed and carted to the warehouse at the cost of the Government, you are out nothing, and you ought to insure your property against losses like other citizens insure theirs." I hope that the committee will hereafter put them to the same accounting that other people in the United States are put. Because a man is in the army of the United States he is no less a citizen of the United States, and he is entitled to no higher consideration, in the judgment of the members of the committee, than any other citizen who pays his taxes and helps support this Government; but in this case I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that the first precedent for paying an army officer for the loss of his goods by fire, the Government thereby being made an insurer, was carried through this House because it was alleged that the officer, instead of trying to attend to the fire in his own house, was busy trying to fight the fire off government property? Was not that the first precedent?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think that was the first case.

Mr. PRINCE. I can not answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. The first case I ever heard of in my service in this House came up in that way, and though it was fought in the House, finally, out of sympathy, the House concluded to reimburse that officer for the property lost, because he was alleged to have been engaged in trying to save the government property, whereas he might have gotten out some of his furniture himself if he had devoted himself to his own private interests instead of the interests of the Government which he serves.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman from New York will yield, possibly I can refresh his recollection. I think he is accurate in his recollection. I know that two or three years ago I had a bill of that character, and I looked up the precedents and found that up until that time the only ones of this character that had been allowed were those where officers had run away from their own property in the effort to save valuable government property. The bill that I had at that time went through because there were two or three precedents of that character, and mine was of that kind.

Mr. PAYNE. Then my recollection is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think both of the gentlemen in error as to the first precedent. I think the first precedent was when a vessel of the United States was sunk in the Samoan Islands, or some place like that, and we provided for the loss of every sailor and officer on that vessel, and we have been doing it ever since. That went back away beyond those to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Illinois says that he hopes to stop this by adding one more precedent. That is the way precedents grow up in this House.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are other cases pending before the gentleman's committee involving claims for personal property lost by government officials other than army officers. Is it the intention of the gentleman's committee to consider them in the same way that they do the cases of army officers?

Mr. PRINCE. I have said that if I had the making of this originally I would not have paid the army officers. I do not believe the United States should be an insurer of private property. I do not think army officers stand any higher as citizens of the United States than citizens who are not in the army, because the citizens who are not in the army in time of war may come into the army. They are all on an equality, it seems to me.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it to be the policy of the gentleman's committee to consider the claim of other government employees for loss of personal effects the same as it did this one?

Mr. PRINCE. If I had the doing of it over again, I would not favor this; and if I would not favor this, surely I would not favor the gentleman's case.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to have an answer to the question if I can get it.

Mr. PRINCE. I am not in favor of the Government of the United States paying for the loss of property——

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the gentleman is in favor of making an exception in the case of this army officer?

Mr. PRINCE. I stated very frankly that there were three officers on this same boat who lost their property. Two of them have been paid, and in view of that former act of Congress I feel in a way bound to pay the third. If I were beginning the thing over again, I would pay none of the three.

Mr. ANTHONY. The point is this: Before the gentleman's committee there are now pending bills to reimburse, for loss of personal effects, employees of the Government Weather Bureau—for instance, losses sustained in the recent hurricane in Florida—and bills to reimburse other government employees for loss of personal effects. Will the gentleman put these government employees on a different plane from the officers of the army?

Mr. PRINCE. Speaking for myself alone, I shall oppose the payment of those claims.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then why is it just to allow this one to go through?

Mr. PRINCE. The only semblance of justice in this is that three men on the same boat lost their property and Congress has by act reimbursed two of them. Congress is the judge of this, not myself. Congress has seen fit to pass bills paying two of these men, and I submit this case to Congress.

If they want to pay this bill, all right; if they do not want to pay it we want them to say so, and we will be extremely well pleased if they would give us their views on this question so that we can carry them out.

Mr. ANTHONY. I submit that these other employees of the Government, although they may be very modest ones, men who are not as prominent as these army officers, are entitled to the same treatment, and therefore I shall oppose this bill if it is not intended to treat all alike.

Mr. PRINCE. If the House will so act, the committee will be entirely content with that action.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of my distinguished colleague from Illinois and the Committee on Claims as a committee of the House, to the fact that this is not a very proper way to make a report on a bill.

Mr. PRINCE. I am very frank to say that is true.

Mr. MANN. The report on the bill gives no information of any kind whatever, except to say that the committee thinks the bill ought to pass with an amendment and then it stops.

Mr. PRINCE. I think the gentleman is right about that, and I am willing to say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not ask the gentleman to put himself on record, but I did desire to call his attention to that. I would like now to call attention to the amendment proposed by the committee. The bill provides that the sum of $1,584 shall be paid to Captain Johnson, provided—and that is this amendment—provided that the accounting officer of the Treasury shall require a schedule and affidavit from him, such schedule to be approved by the Secretary of War. Is this to be a schedule of the property lost and an affidavit supporting it, and stating that he lost the property? After providing that the money shall be paid here, suppose his schedule does not amount to $1,584. Is that amount of money to be paid to the man anyhow? Under this amendment he could file a schedule, stating that he had lost one dollar's worth of property, and have that approved by the Secretary of War, and then receive the $1,584 from the Treasury in payment of his lost property. It seems to me that is not a good proposition.

Mr. PRINCE. I am frank to say to my colleague if that bears that construction the committee does not want it to bear that construction. What the committee wants is this: That there shall be appropriated $1,584, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for losses which appear to the accounting officer of the Treasury upon a schedule filed that this officer has lost this property. If he has lost $1,000 worth, they only pay him $1,000 worth.

Mr. MANN. But the bill provides that a certain amount shall be paid.

Mr. PRINCE. I see.

Mr. MANN. If his schedule is filed without reference to the amount of the loss—and the report of the committee gives no information on the subject—may I ask the gentleman whether his committee does have information that this man did lose this property to this amount and the War Department so reports it?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; there is the report, and it ought to have been printed.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman on the merits of the proposition. Having paid two of these men for the same character of loss the committee and Congress can not make a distinction between the other two and this one, and having paid a whole lot of these claims similar in recent years we might stop on some claim, but I do not think we ought to stop on one where we have paid losses to two men exactly alike on the same ship.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE]. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "dollars," insert the following words: "And said sum of $1,584 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of my colleague to the fact that probably that amendment is not necessary, and certainly we do not want to say in the bill that there shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated a sum of blank dollars, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. That is a redundancy which does not seem to be necessary to print in the statutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. All I ask the gentleman is to modify his amendment to the extent of inserting "which sum is hereby appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "dollars," in line 6, the words "which sum is hereby appropriated."

Mr. PRINCE. One word in explanation. This same objection was made by my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. BENNET]. I sent a bill of the kind to the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him to pencil in just what he thought ought to be there. Following out that suggestion, he sent back a pencil reference exactly as the committee has now submitted the amendment. He said the other was all right, but he thought that the language was inelegant. I am satisfied with either one of them.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that if the gentleman wants to get the bill in the proper language he keep in the amendment as inserted, and strike out, from lines 4 and 5, the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so that the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Evan M. Johnson, United States Army, the sum of $1,584, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Why not also say "which sum or so much thereof as may be necessary?"

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. PRINCE. I think you ought to make it "so much thereof." I accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PRINCE. Let the Clerk read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so that the bill will read:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Evan M. Johnson, United States Army, the sum of $1,584, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be payment in full for all losses of personal property incurred by him by reason of the sinking of the U. S. transport Meade in the harbor of Ponce, P. R., on or about March 24, 1902: Provided, That the accounting officer of the Treasury shall require a schedule and affidavit from him, such schedule to be approved by the Secretary of War."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PRINCE, the bill as amended was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BANK OF FREEBURG, OF FREEBURG, MO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 18563) for the relief of the Bank of Freeburg, of Freeburg, Mo.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18563) for the relief of the Bank of Freeburg, of Freeburg, Mo.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Bank of Freeburg, of Freeburg, Mo., the sum of $175, being the amount of money which was contained in registered letter No. 86, addressed to Joseph Wolff, at Argyle, Mo., and destroyed in the burning of the post-office at Argyle, Mo., December 11, 1907.

Also the following committee amendment:

In line 5 strike out the words "two hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and seventy-five."

Mr. PRINCE. This is a bill, Mr. Chairman, to reimburse for the amount of a registered letter, No. 86, addressed to Joseph F. Wolff, Argyle, Mo., and destroyed in the burning of the post-office at Argyle, Mo., December 11, 1907. The amount was $200. The committee have amended it upon a report from the department and made the amount $175.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the bill has been submitted to the Post-Office Department for recommendation?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. What report have they made upon this bill?

Mr. PRINCE. I think you will find that by the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no such recommendation or no reference in the report to the effect that the bill has been submitted to the department for any consideration whatsoever. Has the committee or any member of the committee any other document referring to the attitude of the department concerning this bill other than that which is contained in the printed report?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I may say I introduced this bill myself and went to the department to make inquiry about it, and the Third Assistant Postmaster-General addressed to me a communication, which I laid before the Committee on Claims, and which is contained in the report here, as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, January 26, 1909.

DEAR SIR: In response to the verbal request made by you during your visit to the department to-day, you are informed that on April 3, 1908, this office certified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department as approved the claim of the Bank of Freeburg, Freeburg, Mo., for limited indemnity in the sum of $25, on account of the loss of registered letter No. 86, containing $200, mailed by the Bank of Freeburg, at Freeburg, Mo., on December 11, 1907, and addressed to Joseph F. Wulff, Argyle, Mo., which letter was destroyed by fire in the burning of the post-office at Argyle, Mo., on December 11, 1907.

Respectfully,
A. L. LAWSHE,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. D. W. SHACKLEFORD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to convey to the committee that that consists of a recommendation in favor of this bill, or that the bill has at any time been submitted to the Post-Office Department concerning its attitude as to whether or not it should pass?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I mean to say that this was submitted to the discretion of Congress as to whether it should pass, and to the department for a statement of the facts, in order to present it to Congress. We are here simply attempting to take the judgment of Congress as to whether this bill ought to pass, and in order that Congress may exercise a wise discretion. I submitted what the Post-Office Department says with reference to the facts in the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not generally the practice of your committee, when bills are submitted to it of a private character for relief, to submit them to the department and ask whether they recommend them or not?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Very frequently that is done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not mostly the uniform practice?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not think it is the uniform practice at all. That is a matter addressed to the discretion of Congress, and Congress ought to have the facts, and having the facts, it is for Congress to say whether they will pay it or not.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I want to say, in response to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that this is a matter of which I have some personal knowledge. This matter was before the committee when I was chairman. We considered it and favorably reported to the House. When this bill was before the committee, it was submitted to the Post-Office Department, and the department reported that all the department could pay, because of the limit of liability, was $25, and allowed that amount. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General wrote a letter to the committee, or to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], a member of the committee, and said, having allowed the limited liability, $25, the balance of the loss, $175, is now submitted to Congress for its action. That is all there is to it. There is no question about the loss.

Mr. STAFFORD. I feel quite certain, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that if this bill had been referred to the Post-Office Department it would have been reported to that committee and to this House with an unfavorable recommendation. I say that for the following reasons: First, the law authorizes no payment for the loss of registered packages in excess of $100. The former postal regulation was that upon proof of loss they would pay to the extent of $25, but the rule has recently been modified, and at the present time they make an allowance of $50. Here we are establishing a precedent that if the proof shows that a person sends a package of registered mail, no matter how much it may contain, whether it be $500, $5,000, or $500,000, that upon its being proven that the loss was without the fault of the person sending it the Government of the United States should reimburse the sender.

I wish to protest as strongly as I can against establishing any such precedent. Particularly in this case should we reject this bill, because it is not the case of an innocent user of the mails, an ordinary person, but a bank, that should be acquainted with the usual practice for the sending of large sums of money. Where is it shown in the evidence before us, or the statement made by any person here, that this money could not have been sent by this bank in the ordinary course of business by a draft? But you are now imposing upon the Government liability that should not be assumed by the Government. The Government in the transaction of its registered-package business does not assume to undertake to insure the delivery of money in unlimited amounts. If they carry amounts running up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars they do so under the limitation of law, which provides that it will not be liable beyond $100.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Government is assuming no liability in this matter, and could not assume any. This money, as the testimony in this case shows, was outstanding liabilities against the Government. The fire canceled the outstanding liabilities against the Government. The Government is $200 ahead by reason of that fire. Every dollar of that, as shown by the testimony, was paper money, for which the Government itself is liable. It was burned, and the government liability was redeemed. The Government is ahead $200, and that $200 was lost by my constituent. I want to say that there is precedent after precedent for this.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Was this United States currency or national-bank notes, and does that make any difference?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am not able to say about that. It was all paper money.

Mr. MANN. Was it the promise of the United States Government to pay, or the promise of national banks to pay?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In either event it is the same.

Mr. MANN. If it were national-bank notes?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If it were national-bank notes, the security for the national-bank notes is in the vaults of the Treasury to-day.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but I want to know if it makes any difference.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think it does not.

Mr. MANN. I should think there is a difference where the money lost is national currency and in another case it is national-bank notes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How would a national bank get its security except by presenting the notes?

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the national-bank law is as to that matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I dare say that in the event it is national banks it would be given to the national banks again.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, Mr. Chairman, so far as this bill is concerned, there can be no basis for this claim upon the statement of the gentleman from Missouri. If this claimant is going to be reimbursed for the currency that has been destroyed, he should file his claim for that purpose with the Secretary of the Treasury, who should be directed to pay him for the currency destroyed.

But you are calling upon the Post-Office Department to reimburse him for the loss of a registered package; not for the loss of currency, but for the loss of a registered package. From the testimony here, accepting the statement of the gentleman at its full value—and it is entitled to be so accepted—how do we know that this claimant has not, in the ordinary course, gone and presented his claim for this burnt money before the Treasury Department? The members of this committee know that when money is destroyed by fire it can be redeemed, if there is any evidence whatever from an examination of the charred material, no matter how difficult of identification.

Mr. GARRETT. That would depend upon whether it was a national-bank note or United States currency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Upon the charred remains of the money which has been destroyed being presented, if there is enough left to enable the department to identify any part of it, they will reissue new currency in place of it. But this question here is one of reimbursement because of the loss of a registered package, and the Government says that in no instance will it reimburse anybody for the loss of a registered package to exceed $100.

Mr. GARRETT. If it is a national-bank note, there must be enough left of the note for them to be able to determine the bank of issue, or else it will not be redeemed.

Mr. STAFFORD. They must have some means whereby they can determine it; but this is not that character of a claim. The gentleman does not seek to recover upon that ground. He seeks to recover because of the nondelivery of a registered letter. Now, I wish to protest strongly, because you are establishing a bad precedent. It is not a question of $175. If we pass this bill, we will be presented with any number of claims on the part of persons who send through the mails larger amounts than the Government undertakes to reimburse in case of the loss of registered mail.

We do not have in the postal service the safeguards for the carrying of large amounts of money, such as the express companies have. When currency is sent by express there are special safes in which it is locked. Not so with registered mail matter. When banks see fit to transmit money, they send it by draft or bill of exchange. Not so with this bank in this case. Unless some proof is shown to the contrary, I think this banker is guilty of laches in sending that much money through the mail. He must be presumed to know the law, that the full liability of the Government is $100, and he should not come to Congress now and ask to be reimbursed for the extra amount. For that reason I protest against the passage of the bill. If this banker has a claim against the Government because it happens to have been currency that was destroyed, let him present his bill in that form and not in the form of a claim for the loss of a registered letter. This bill has never been referred to any department. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] calls upon the Third Assistant Postmaster-General and requests him to give him the facts connected with this case. If it is a claim for reimbursement because of destroyed money, why did he not go to the Secretary of the Treasury and ascertain whether there has been any reimbursement in that particular? So long as he sought his relief through the Post-Office Department, so long as he has sought to construe this as being a recovery by reason of the loss of a registered letter, which is the issue here, we should refuse to recommend this bill favorably.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. In reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I want to say that this matter was presented to the Post-Office Department, but under the regulation of that department the only liability of the Government was $25.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg to differ with the gentleman. By express provision of law the liability is $100.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. The Post-Office Department, which ought to know, took the position that their liability in this case was $25, and therefore they paid that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman would go to the law he would find that the liability of the Government for the loss of a registered letter is not above $100, but that the Post-Office Deparment may by regulation pay a less amount. At the time this matter was presented for indemnity the regulation of the department was that it should be not more than $25. As I said in prefacing my remarks, at present the maximum allowance is $50.

The gentleman does not seek his recovery because this money has been destroyed, but seeks it because it was the result of a loss of a registered package. This claimant has his rights on the ground that the money has been destroyed, but when he introduces a bill of that character it should be sent to the Treasury Department for recommendation. We must consider this bill exclusively as to the form that it is in, for the loss of a registered package, where a bank knowingly sent more money through the mail than the law permits it to be recompensed for.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. The gentleman says that this is a case for the destruction of the money, and that the gentleman from Missouri ought to present a bill of that kind. This is what the bill provides. It provides for the payment of $175, being the amount of money which was contained in registered letter No. 86, addressed to Joseph Wolf, Argyle, Mo., and destroyed in the burning of the post-office at Argyle, Mo., December 11, 1907.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to say——

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. I do not want the gentleman to yield to me; I will get the floor in my own right at the proper time. I will wait until the gentleman from Wisconsin is through.

Mr. PRINCE. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman will not take up the time. I have agreed to ask the committee to rise about 2 o'clock, and I would like to get along a little further with these bills. If the bill is of so much importance, let it be laid aside.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to its being passed without prejudice.

Mr. PRINCE. No; let us settle it now.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are innumerable precedents for the allowance of this claim. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that we should apply to the Treasury Department and ask to be reimbursed for the loss of these identical bills. He knows as well as anybody that in the ordinary course of business nobody has the number of these bills. Nobody can go to the department and identify or state the particular numbers of the bills that will show what was lost. There is no way in which this man can be compensated for this loss except in the way we have asked. I do not know what the bills were. The banker has not the number of the bills; he does not know whether they were treasury notes or national-bank notes. No reasonable business man ever keeps the number of a bill. If we can not get this loss by such a bill as this, we can not get it at all. There are many precedents for this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Only one word, Mr. Chairman, in reply. We have no evidence before the committee that this currency, if it was currency, has not been reproduced by the Treasury Department. You have not referred the bill to the proper Treasury officials. You are basing your whole claim on the fact that it was a registered package and asking for relief in contravention of the law and regulations of the Post-Office Department. I believe it is a bad precedent and that the bill should not be passed.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 35, noes 4.

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6935) for the relief of the Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

The Clerk read the amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to redeem a certain duplicate United States bond issued in place of a certain United States bond No. 10307, for $10,000, under act of July 14, 1870 (consols of 1907), inscribed in the name of the Dutchess County Mutual Insurance Company, and assigned in blank, held by said Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and lost or destroyed on or about the 24th day of July, 1880, which said duplicate bond is registered in the name of the Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay in full redemption and satisfaction of said bond and duplicate to the Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, forthwith the sum of $10,000, together with interest, if any, accrued thereon at 4 per cent to the 1st day of July, 1907, the date when said bond was called for redemption and payment: Provided, however, That the indemnity bond executed and filed by the Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., pursuant to the terms of said act of Congress, passed the 21st day of May, 1888, shall stand and remain as a continuing liability to secure the United States from any loss, cost, or damages, or claims made on account of said original bond.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect immediately upon approval and passage of same.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether this bill is in the shape so that it effects the purpose for which it was prepared. I remember this bill in five or six different shapes that were objectionable.

Mr. PRINCE. My colleague says that it is in the proper shape to make it effective.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN H. FITZHUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 18249) for the relief of estate of John H. Fitzhugh, deceased.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to John H. Fitzhugh and W. B. Fitzhugh, children and heirs at law of John H. Fitzhugh, deceased, $380.46, for services rendered by the said John H. Fitzhugh, deceased, as United States mail carrier on star routes Nos. 4174 and 4995, Virginia, prior to April 1, 1861.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is one of those cases that is unique, and I think that attention ought to be called to it. A man without any claim against the Government that he knew of, without any thought that there was any claim against the Government, has money shoved onto him by Congress at the suggestion of the Post-Office Department. The bill was introduced in the House to pay a certain sum of money on the ground that it was due the man under a contract for a star route in Virginia prior to the war. That bill was introduced in the House, I think, at a special session of Congress. In the course of time the bill was referred to the Post-Office Department for report. Of course, so far as the report of the Post-Office Department is concerned, it is like other reports. The confederate records do not show whether the claim was paid or not, but the department, not satisfied in reporting the bill which was referred to it for a report, for some inscrutable reason, in making the report upon the bill which was referred to it, undertook to say that these people, who never dreamed that they had any additional claim against the Government, were also in possession of another claim against the Government.

In addition to the above there is a balance of $186.04 in its favor for services performed on route No. 4959, Virginia, during the contract term, 1855 to 1859. The whole amount apparently due him is therefore $380.46.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me wholly improbable that this man doing star-route service from 1855 to 1859 collected no money from anybody. It is true the records of the department, old as they are, do not show the money was paid. It is true that the records of the confederate government in the possession of the Post-Office Department, not complete, do not show that the claim was paid. It is also true that the people at interest did not dream they had such a claim, and although they were urging the payment of another claim for star-route service against the Government nothing was said about this; but my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], seizing every opportunity, as he does, to take care of his constituents, as soon as this report came back from the department, dropped the bill which he had previously introduced at the request of his constituents and introduced a new bill to pay the total amount, including what seemed to be a balance due back in 1855. That is a long time ago to commence to pay bills, bills that were not paid because of the war, bills which probably were paid, which probably were settled, but which the department has not ascertained were paid, and which the department undertakes to say, without being asked about it, is an item due to a man for services rendered in 1855, which he did not know about, which his children did not know about, which the Member of Congress from the district had never heard of. I think it is a very queer proceeding, and worthy at least of attracting the attention of my distinguished friend from North Carolina.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is complaining because gentlemen like myself are willing to correct their own mistakes. I might have introduced a bill for $194.42 at first, though I have no recollection of doing so. However, if I did, the records of the Treasury Department, of the Auditor of the Post-Office Department, show that I was mistaken and that the true amount owing to claimants was $380.46 instead of $194.42. If the gentleman will take the trouble to look at the report of the Postmaster-General of January 17, 1903, in response to a resolution of the Senate asking for a report of the amounts due to the mail carriers in the South prior to the war, "in cases where the confederate records on file in the department fail to show payment by the confederate government," he will find that there was due the late John H. Fitzhugh, father of claimant, by this government the exact amount of this bill, $380.46. There have, as I now recall, been eight bills similar to this passed by Congress in the last six or seven years. In 1867, on account of sectional feeling which had been engendered by the civil war, Congress passed an act prohibiting the payment to anyone of any claim that arose prior to the war, unless it appeared that the claimant had been actually opposed to the confederate government. On account of this these claims were not presented to Congress with any prospect of passage until after 1898, after the Spanish war, when a better feeling prevailed. Since that time not a single one of these claims, when supported by proper proof, has failed of passage, and there have been eight of them, I think. The services were rendered to the Government. The amount is due and the bill ought to pass.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will any of this money go to a claim agent or a claim attorney?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not a penny. It goes to the two sons of the late Mr. Fitzhugh.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice the gentleman from North Carolina is sitting upon the Republican side of the House. Does the gentleman from North Carolina consider it is a good bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I think it is a good bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman, then, why he presents the bill from the Republican side of the House, as being a good bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. From this side of the House? [Laughter.]
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.
Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I came over here, not to present the bill, but to temporarily decentize this side of the House. [Renewed laughter.]
Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.
The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.
Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills to the House with a recommendation that they do pass.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GAINES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar, reported from the Committee on Claims, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, some with amendment and some without amendment, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the several bills as amended and unamended do pass.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9447) for the relief of J. A. Denny.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.
The Clerk read as follows.

A bill (H. R. 11821) for the relief of John H. McBrayer.

The amendments were agreed to.
The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14729) for the relief of Capt. Evan M. Johnson, United States Army.

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18563) for the relief of the Bank of Freeburg, Freeburg, Mo.

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6935) for the relief of the Merchants' National Bank, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18249) for the relief of the estate of John H. Fitzhugh, deceased.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21419), the post-office appropriation bill; Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday the Chair was about to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] to offer an amendment in line 3, page 16 of the bill. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter substitute letter carriers be paid at the rate of 30 cents an hour for the time they are employed when serving in the places of regular carriers on leave of absence with pay, or when serving for carriers who are granted leave of absence with pay, in order that they may serve as members of the local civil-service boards, or as witnesses for the Government in the United States courts; and that they shall be paid the pro rata salary of carriers for whom they serve who are absent without pay."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.
Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment of mine is unquestionably subject to the point of order, but I present it for the purpose of again calling to the attention of this committee the manifest injustice that obtains in the substitute carrier service. Under existing law a substitute carrier is paid at the rate of 30 cents an hour when employed. He may take the place of a carrier who earns $1,200 a year, and if that carrier be absent without pay, I believe that the substitute should get the pro rata pay while serving for the absent carrier, provided the department is not also paying the absentee. Now, the carrier service in the big cities, in first and second class offices, is recruited from these substitutes. They are compelled to serve, under existing conditions, on an average of four years before they go into the regular service. Rarely is it the case that one of them receives $40 a month, yet for four years they struggle on in the hope of being called into the regular carrier service. They are compelled to buy uniforms. They are at the beck and call of the department from 6.45 in the morning until 5 at night, and, as I say, they frequently work four years as substitutes before they reach the regular service. When they do get into the regular service it is in the lowest grade, and in which they must serve for a year or more at a salary of but $12 a week. Now, if my amendment obtained, it would not burden the department. It would not draw upon the funds of the department to any greater extent than under the prevailing system to allow these men the pay of regular carriers who are absent without pay. Yesterday the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], explaining why the $500 labor class was stricken out of the bill, stated to the committee that it was because of the impossibility to get men to work at a fixed salary of $500 a year, yet here are men who have passed a civil-service examination requiring considerable mental skill, who are eventually to become carriers in the service, working in the department for four years at the miserable rate of $40 a month. Everybody knows that the carrier service is a splendid branch of the service in which to be employed and that these men are ambitious to reach it. They toil on at a pay that will not cover their expenses, no matter how economically they may live. Many of them are married men and must apply themselves absolutely to the work of substitutes. When they do reach the regular service many of them are in debt, for no man can support a family on $10 per week these times, and it is many years before they get out of debt.
Now, it means this, that unless some change is made in this system, unless some provision is made to properly pay substitutes, we are going to get a cheaper class of men in the service, because no man with a family, no man who lives decently, can afford to struggle with such discouraging conditions for four years. We ought to provide these men at least a living wage, and we ought to do so immediately. I offer this amendment solely for the purpose of again calling the attention of the committee to the fact that a desirable change ought to be made, some remedy afforded to the 5,000 men in this branch of the service, that will insure the maintenance of the splendid standard of efficiency and integrity which now characterizes the carrier service of the country.
Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, before insisting on the point of order which I have reserved, I wish to say that the statement made by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] simply emphasizes the high character of the carrier service and the desirability of getting into it. Even under the conditions under which these men labor they frequently, as he has stated, remain on the substitute lists for three or four years, put themselves to inconveniences, financial and otherwise, for the sake of reaching that goal—the carrier service. The department made no recommendation on this subject, and the committee has considered no change. It has no evidence which warrants making a change. The statement made by my colleague indicates that possibly this matter should some time be further investigated, and if it is called to the attention of the committee next time it frames a post-office appropriation bill, I am sure it will be given careful consideration.
I insist on the point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, if adopted, would be a change of existing law, and is, therefore, in violation of clause 2 of Rule XXI, providing that legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill. Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 3, after the word "dollars," insert the following:
"Provided, That a substitute appointed regular, having served as a substitute less than one year, shall be paid a salary of $600, his rating to begin at the time of his appointment as substitute carrier.

"A substitute carrier appointed regular, having served as a substitute one year and less than two, his entrance salary shall be $800, his rating to begin at the time of his appointment as substitute carrier.

"A substitute appointed regular, having served as a substitute two years and less than three, shall be paid a salary of $900, his rating to begin at time of his appointment as substitute carrier.

"A substitute appointed a regular carrier, having served as a substitute three years and less than four, shall be paid an entrance salary of $1,000, his rating to begin at time of appointment as substitute carrier and the full limit of salary thereafter."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I was in hopes that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] would not make a point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER]. I hardly think it is an answer to say that because the Post-Office Department has not made any recommendation that therefore the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, or this House, should not take action that would remedy a wrong. The amendment, if it had been adopted, would have afforded some relief to the substitute carriers. My purpose in offering this amendment is again to test the sentiment of the committee in reference to the substitute carriers.

Now, in effect, my amendment means this, that the time which a man serves as a substitute shall be taken into consideration at the time of his appointment as a regular carrier. In other words, if a man has served three or four years as a substitute, that that time be allowed to him at the time of his appointment as a regular carrier, and he be promoted to the grade to which he would be otherwise entitled as a regular carrier.

Now, what is wrong with this proposition? It involves no appropriation. It adds nothing to the burden of this department. It simply directs the Post-Office Department to take into consideration the time. Mr. Chairman, the average time a substitute serves is three years, and under the law he receives pay at the rate of 30 cents an hour when employed. Some days he has an opportunity of obtaining time. Many days he has not. Yet, he is required to report to the office every day and is at all times subject to the orders of the postmaster of his district. It takes him out of all other employment, and after a service of three long years with an average pay of $30 a month, he is finally appointed a regular carrier. And then he starts in at the $600 grade. In order to reach the last grade he has been nine years in the service. Now, I submit that that is very discouraging. Unless action is taken you will continue to discourage men from entering that service. Remember, he must pass a successful examination and have the necessary qualifications. Again, a substitute who has served three long years is familiar with most every route in his district and becomes a very efficient carrier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOEBEL. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will not be willing to print? I am going to insist on the point of order.

Mr. GOEBEL. Well, if the gentleman is going to insist on the point of order——

Mr. WEEKS. I will not insist on it if you want to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman's request that he may continue for five minutes longer.

Mr. GOEBEL. Why should he not be credited with the time he served as a substitute? In this way you can encourage men to enter the service.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. I will.

Mr. MANN. While I agree with the gentleman, does he not think it would be more for the benefit of both the substitutes and the service to provide the substitute during the two, three, or four years he is a substitute a sufficient amount, that the man receives from the Government, to keep body and soul together, rather than to entice him to go through these years of starvation in order to get a higher salary at the end of that time?

Mr. GOEBEL. I fully agree with the gentleman; but, unfortunately, Congress has not yet come to the relief of the substitute. But here is an opportunity to remedy this great evil. I am a little surprised to see my friend from Massachusetts make a point of order against it. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that he will not insist upon it, and that the committee may now adopt this amendment and, to that extent, perfect the bill and, in a measure, do justice to the substitute carrier.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to make the point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, on the ground that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. This reduces the appropriation from what it was last year, how much?

Mr. WEEKS. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. What is the reason for the reduction?

Mr. WEEKS. There will be a balance of $227,000.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether the gentleman has had his attention called to it, but last year in the city of Chicago, at least in a good many cases, where the carrier went on a vacation other carriers were required to do his work. The place where I was living last summer I saw a carrier staggering almost under the weight of the mail when the time came for him to stop work. So that my mail would not be delivered to me as quickly as if I had been living a long way from the railway station in the country on a rural route. It does not seem to me that it was very wise, in the way of economy, to so provide that it was impossible for a carrier to deliver the mails that he had by reason of forbidding a substitute to be employed. That is the way they saved this amount. It is a mistaken economy.

Mr. WEEKS. Has the gentleman any motion to make?

Mr. MANN. I have no motion to make, but I desired to get information from the chairman as to whether he was familiar with this condition, and whether it came to the attention of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I am very familiar with the condition. There has been a doubling up of carriers in cases where a large portion of the residents served by those carriers are away for the summer. There have been better methods adopted about routing the mails, and by various other ways the department has been able to reduce the carrier service. Nothing has been brought to the attention of the committee which would warrant the committee in suggesting any change being made in the methods now followed by the department. In 1909, $158,000 was saved out of this appropriation. The First Assistant Postmaster-General for the current year estimates the saving will be $250,000, in which case we are appropriating $50,000 more than will be necessary for the service. But in order to be liberal, in order to take care of the district represented by the gentleman from Illinois, we have added $50,000 to what we think may be a fair appropriation, and we believe that the service can be properly carried on with that amount.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the difficulty was not in the appropriation committee, nor was it with the post-office officials in Chicago, who knew something in regard to the case. The difficulty is that an order has been issued by some post-office official in Washington, who knows nothing concerning the local situation, doubling the requirements that are made upon these carriers, requiring those who are on duty while others are on leave of absence to do double work instead of putting substitutes in their places. They require the carrier to perform the service without compensation, and in that way save money. Now, I have no criticism of the committee, having got their advice from the department, but I think the department, in that matter is subject to criticism; and I know in the case about myself, where my own home was, it was not because people were away from the city.

The trouble was that a carrier was relieved and another carrier required to do his work, when to begin with each had all the work that he ought to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think the criticism made by the gentleman from Illinois is quite appropriate. I understand that a new practice has been initiated in the large cities in the summer time, to give a carrier in addition to his ordinary route a portion or all of another route, and compel him to attempt to deliver the mail in this additional territory, on the theory that because of the absence of some residents in the country his work is not so laborious on his own route. The truth is, however, that because of the excessive heat and other climatic conditions the carriers are unable properly to cover the additional routes given them by the department. While the carriers receive their annual leave, those who have to wait until late in the summer are considerably run down because of the overwork imposed upon them, and those who have their vacations in the early part of the summer have this additional work imposed upon them later, greatly to their detriment.

The theory of the annual leave is that these men by having a reasonable amount of time for recreation and recuperation will be better able to discharge their duties for the rest of the year; but in the large communities where the climatic conditions are such that the heat of the day is excessive and the work is very arduous this doubling up or enlarging of the route to be traveled by the carrier has not aided him in being more efficient. I hope that the influence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], combined with the aid of the chairman of the committee [Mr. WEEKS], will result in a change of policy, so that this excessive zeal may not be shown in attempting to economize by compelling carriers to do more than a fair share of the work, while perfect indifference is shown to the apparently excessive leaks that seem to be occurring in other branches of the postal service.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6661. An act in aid of navigation of the Cape Fear River at and below the city of Wilmington, N. C.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For horse-hire allowance and the rental of vehicles, $925,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two. Are the automobiles used by the Post-Office Department in gathering up mail matter included in the paragraph that has just been read?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. How many automobiles are used in this city by the department in gathering up the mail?

Mr. WEEKS. I think two or three. I am not sure about that.

Mr. HAMLIN. What rental is paid for each one of these machines?

Mr. WEEKS. I think it is $3,000 a year.

Mr. HAMLIN. For each machine?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Three thousand dollars a year for each machine?

Mr. WEEKS. In answer to a question on that subject, the First Assistant Postmaster-General stated:

I think the price for automobiles, sixteen hours a day, including a chauffeur, is about $3,000 for each machine.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can the gentleman give us any idea as to the cost of these machines for which we are paying an annual rental of $3,000 per year?

Mr. WEEKS. There is no testimony on that subject before the committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the character of these machines? Are they just these little runabouts?

Mr. WEEKS. These machines are used for sixteen hours a day, and the rental includes the services of two men. A driver runs the machine eight hours, and then another man takes his place, so that the service includes the machine and two men.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am informed that these machines cost on an average about $450 each. Has the gentleman any information to the contrary?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not find anything in the testimony regarding that, but I should be surprised if a machine of the character which I see on the streets could be bought for $450.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it not true that in the city of New York a two-horse wagon and a driver, engaged in the same business exactly, are obtained for $1,320 per year?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; that is for the screen-wagon service.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 8, page 16, insert:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used to pay annual rental of automobiles at a price of over $1,400 for each machine."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I do not believe that the amendment is subject to a point of order, because it is clearly a limitation on this appropriation. But I want to submit to the committee that I have read with some care the hearings before the Post-Office Committee. It appears that in the city of Washington, in the city of Milwaukee, in the city of Indianapolis, and in the city of Boston they use automobiles, and they are the only cities in the United States in which these machines are used for this purpose. I am informed—I do not know upon how good authority—that these little machines used in the city of Washington—and I think they are of the same character in the other States——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. If the gentleman had any acquaintance with the machines used in the other cities he would not say that the character of automobiles in Milwaukee, Indianapolis, and Boston are to be compared with these little obsolete automobiles here in Washington.

Mr. HAMLIN. Where does the gentleman get his information as to the different character of machines in the other cities? I am not yielding for a speech, only for a direct answer to my question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I come from a city where this service is installed, and I know of my own knowledge that the character of the automobiles in Milwaukee is entirely different from those in use here. Furthermore, there was displayed before the members of the subcommittee photographs of the machines in use in Indianapolis and New York. If the gentleman wishes to see them, he can see them in the room of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I accepted the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the machines used in the other cities are very much better than those used in this city, it only convicts the Post-Office Department of very bad business sagacity, to say the least. Why? Every man that is giving any attention to the machines used in this city knows that they are simply little, cheap gasoline runabouts. The evidence given to me by the chairman of the committee is that the Post-Office Department pays an annual rental of $3,000 in Washington for these machines.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. The gentleman does not undertake to say that the chairman of the committee gave him any such information. He said that the machines plus the two drivers brought the $3,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly, there is no dispute between us. When I speak of the machine I speak of the drivers, just as I referred to the two-horse wagon service in New York costing $1,320; that included the driver and the forage and every expense in connection with the wagon.

Mr. SMITH of California. In the gentleman's amendment, does he include the two drivers?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; or else I would have made it $300, allowing the difference between $300 and $1,400 for the wages, and that is good wages.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may be good wages from the Democratic standpoint, but not from the Republican standpoint.

Mr. HAMLIN. I observe that the Republicans are very anxious to get the jobs, but the Democrats have no chance.

Mr. STAFFORD. These jobs are not at the disposal of the Republicans.

Mr. KELIHER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELIHER. I want to know what the gentleman's idea is of the prevailing wages for chauffeurs?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not enjoyed the luxury of being in a position to ride in automobiles, and so I do not know the prevailing wages of the chauffeurs, but I understand it is $60 to $75 per month.

[The time of Mr. HAMLIN having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended five minutes.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman from Wisconsin, as I understood in reply to the statement, said that this represented the Democratic idea of wages. I want to suggest that the gentleman's argument seems to be that the Democratic idea was that automobiles ought not to be paid more than men.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a question of the chauffeur. We say that $550 a year, which is the gentleman's proposition, is not an adequate compensation for a service of eight hours a day for a chauffeur.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman fails to make the proper calculation. I said in answer to the gentleman from California that if I were not to include the wages of a chauffeur, I would not put the rental of the machine over $300. But this includes the wages of a chauffeur, and I make it $1,400. That is better wages than you fellows are paying the letter carriers of the country.

Mr. SMITH of California. The gentleman's proposition is that out of the $1,400 he will pay two men and the rental of the machine and its upkeep?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; that is a sufficient amount, I think. Now, Mr. Chairman, if $1,320 is a sufficient rental to pay a man for two horses and a wagon and a driver and for the feed and care of these horses and the repair of the vehicle, $1,400 is a sufficient amount to pay for one of these little gasoline runabouts here.

If it is impossible to operate one of these machines for less than $3,000, then for God's sake let us do away with these automobiles and get back to horses. We can furnish you plenty of Missouri mules that will gather up the mail.

Mr. MURPHY. Why does not the Government purchase these automobiles?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the question I asked the chairman a while ago, if it was not true that we could buy one of these machines for $450. If we can, then we can certainly hire a Republican chauffeur and pay for our machine, and do it all within a thousand dollars per year.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is cheaper than you can get a pair of Missouri mules for.

Mr. HAMLIN. One Missouri mule is worth half a dozen of the gasoline runabouts.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They sold one there yesterday for $3,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in perfect good faith. I feel it is inexcusable to pay $3,000 per year for these machines to gather up this mail. I am absolutely certain that if there is any disposition upon that side of the House to practice economy—and I hope they are in good faith about it—we should cut down the expense of these automobiles; and if we can not hire them at the amount fixed by the amendment, let us get back to the old way of gathering it up with horses and a wagon, which was undoubtedly very satisfactory, so satisfactory that there are only four cities in the United States that have adopted any other method. Let us get back to that and gather it up at the expenditure of much less money, and then we can have some money with which to increase the pay of the letter carriers, both city and rural.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I notice that when a Missouri man makes an untenable proposition he always drags in a mule to becloud the issue. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. But nothing would upset the argument on that side of the House but a mule.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts in the case? We have contracted for some machines to do collecting service in the city of Washington and in three other cities. The contractor in the city of Washington has to provide four machines. They use three of them, but they have to provide a fourth so that they will have a reserve machine in case one of them breaks down. They maintain these machines, keep them in repair, and furnish gasoline or whatever motive power is necessary, and in every other way keep the equipment up to requirements. Each machine is required to have two men, because the machines run sixteen hours and each man is limited to eight hours a day. If we pay these men the same rate we would pay a carrier in the city of Washington—and they will, of course, collect very much more mail than a carrier could on foot—it would cost the Government something like $2,100 a year to pay the two men, to say nothing of the cost and maintenance of the machines. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, in speaking of these contracts, says he considers them especially advantageous. They are to some extent experimental. They have been tried in only four or five cities. It may develop that some other method of collecting the mail is preferable, but until that has been proven, I submit it would be unreasonable to make any change in the present arrangement.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the gentleman to say these chauffeurs ought not to be asked to work for less than the wages of a city carrier. Now, what do city carriers get in the city of Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. The city carriers average something like $1,050 each per year.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is a little over $75 per month.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, then, if you were to pay these chauffeurs $75 per month, that would be $1,800 a year, would it not, for your chauffeur hire?

Mr. WEEKS. If you were to pay them $75 per month; yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, you are paying $3,000 a year rent on each machine, including two drivers, and you could pay the chauffeurs $1,800, and that would leave $100 per month rent and for the wear and tear of each machine.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from Missouri confessed that he had not been operating automobiles, and therefore he is not familiar with the cost of maintaining and running an automobile. It costs a good deal of money to run an automobile sixteen hours a day, even on the streets of Washington. There are renewals, repairs, and spare parts to supply, and many other miscellaneous expenses.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, if the gentleman will permit the question, the point I made was that if it costs so much to use these automobiles, let us go back to the old simple way of doing things where it does not cost so much, and thereby save the money.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, these machines collect from the boxes at the rate of a box a minute, and if we went back to the old method of doing the collecting by a carrier or by a horse or by Missouri mules, we would not be able to collect a quarter as rapidly as we do with these machines. It undoubtedly is an economical measure to adopt this automobile service.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit another question: If the gentleman is correct, and they collect a box a minute, it ought not to take over ten minutes to make a collection. Then how could you need these machines sixteen hours a day?

Mr. WEEKS. We make more than one collection a day; and, as the gentleman knows, there are more than 10 collection boxes in the city of Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this automobile service which is under consideration is a matter of recent origin. Four years ago it was first established in the city of Baltimore. That has since been abandoned, and since then it has been established in the cities of Milwaukee, Detroit, Boston, and is at present in service here in Washington. The service in Washington is under a different form of contract from what it is in the other named cities. Two years ago there was a contract made for the collection by automobiles in this city, and later the contractor became bankrupt at the low rate that was carried in the contract. The contract in this city was not at the rate of $3,000 per automobile, for I admit if it were at such a rate it would be an exorbitant price to be paid for the character of the automobiles I saw this morning going through the streets of Washington gathering up the mail. We should consider this question as to the rate that is paid on the basis of $3,000 per annum for a service for sixteen hours a day, under which the contractor furnishes the chauffeurs and keeps the automobiles in repair and also keeps one or two automobiles in reserve. This service is not only used for the collection from the mail boxes, but it is also used in place of the screen-wagon service for delivery and dispatch of the mails from substations. Now, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the average rate per mile for carriage by the ordinary screen wagon, as shown in the last report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General on page 44, is 30.82 cents per mile traveled. The cost for this automobile service in New York per mile is 22.54. The cost in the other cities varies from 18 to 30 cents. So in no instance, I wish to call the gentleman's attention, does the rate per mile for this service exceed the average rate of the ordinary screen wagon that was formerly used for this collection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. HAMLIN. If it is true, then, that this automobile service is the cheaper service, why has it not been inaugurated in all of the cities?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the very reason that it is in an experimental stage.

Mr. HAMLIN. How is that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I say it is in an experimental stage.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield until I answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the service was first established in Baltimore five years ago the automobile that was used was the ordinary passenger automobile without any special equipment, but the automobiles that are used in these other cities are contracted for and specially designed with box arrangements similar in its compartments to the ordinary screen wagon, and so adapted that there is, as in Milwaukee, space for a clerk or carrier who accompanies the automobile to assort the mail while the automobile is running.

Now, this service is being extended gradually. We did not believe we should establish this all at once, but the department is extending it as fast as they find it is economical. In this bill, in another section, we provide that $100,000, which is appropriated for electric-car service, may be utilized if, in the judgment of the department, it is advisable to substitute automobile for electric-car service.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I simply wanted to make a suggestion to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. With pleasure.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey (continuing). And I think it answers the question of the gentleman perhaps better than anything the gentleman has said yet; and that is, that the city of Washington, on account of the great number of paved or asphalted streets, lends itself more rapidly to this service than any other city in the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. This automobile service is rapidly taking the place, and should take the place, of the pneumatic-tube and electric-car services. For instance, in New York, as the gentlemen from New York who are acquainted with this service can testify, there are automobiles leaving the post-office station at the Grand Central Station every half hour for deliveries to a dozen postal stations distributed throughout Manhattan Island. If we had had the automobile service in operation ten years ago, or fifteen years ago, when the pneumatic service was first established, there is no question whatsoever in my mind but that the Government would have declined to establish the pneumatic tubes, which is acknowledged to be the most expensive service, and have substituted this very economical service by automobiles, which is no higher than that by screen wagons, but which is much more expeditious.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. And if expedition is the one desideratum that is demanded in connection with the proper administration of the postal service——

Mr. PARSONS. Has the gentleman any facts to show that the automobile service in New York would be more expeditious than the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. STAFFORD. Twenty years ago or more we established the system of collection and delivery of mails from substations by the electric street-car service. Then, supplementing that, we established the pneumatic-tube service. That service has been extended against the recommendation of the commission appointed in 1898 to consider the advisability and feasibility of extending that service.

Now comes this question of another substituted service by automobiles. There can be no justification for the continuance of the pneumatic-tube service and for the continuance of the electric-car service for serving the same stations, when those stations can be served by automobiles carrying the mails quickly and frequently.

I have before me a very elaborate table compiled by the Post-Office Department showing the duplication of the electric-car, pneumatic-tube, and automobile services, and a close study of those tables will convince anyone that there is a duplication of service that could be avoided. For instance, in Philadelphia they are having this slow-going method of conveyance by electric cars on those streets which are clogged by the ordinary passenger electric-car service to stations that are at the same time being served by pneumatic tubes. Now, where the stations are many, as in New York City, and along a line reaching far uptown, it seems to me as a matter of economy and of good business administration that one character of service is all that is necessary, and if the mail is dispatched by fast-going automobiles that have the use of the highway, whereby we can contract for them every few years, it will be far better than paying the enormous amount of $17,000 per mile for carriage of only one character of mail, namely, the first-class or letter mail, by pneumatic tube.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman contend that the automobile service in New York is as expeditious as the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not contend it is as expeditious, because those cylinders that are driven by compressed air through the pneumatic tubes go at a much more rapid speed than automobiles, but, nevertheless——

Mr. MANN. If you had an automobile loaded with mail going a distance of 3 or 4 miles, it would be more expeditious?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very glad of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. The mails are received in New York at two stations—one at present—but when the new Pennsylvania depot is established at Eighth avenue, between Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth, with a post-office station in connection with it, 90 per cent of the mail coming to New York will go into these two stations, and it will be much more suitable to have the mail sent in bulk, already routed on the incoming mail trains for dispatch to the various postal stations, than to compel the mails to be delayed by separation into first-class packages, so that they can be sent through the pneumatic tubes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to ask this question. I think the gentleman has got a little off in the discussion. The question was as to what this service was really worth. Does the gentleman contend that a rental of $3,000 per annum in this city is as cheap as the rental of vehicles by which the mail was formerly carried?

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to that question I will state that there is nothing before us to show that we pay $3,000 rental for the automobiles in this city. The testimony in the hearings would show that it is much less.

Now, coming to the proposed amendment——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? If we were amenable to the law in reference to cruelty to animals for driving such old horses as they drive in the mail wagons in this town, and we continued to pay the fines, would it not be a great deal cheaper to have automobile service than use the decrepit old things they do?

Mr. STAFFORD. Considering the distance that can be covered in the same time by an automobile as compared with a horse of the ordinary character, it would be much cheaper to have an automobile for this kind of service. I must decline to yield any further.

I wish to consider the question at hand—the question of limiting the amount to be paid for an automobile to $1,400. The gentleman admits two chauffeurs are required. He says that the average rental ought to be about $1,400. I can not, from the standpoint of Republican policy of upholding wages, permit for one moment the idea to go to the country that we are in favor of having chauffeurs, expert machinists, receiving the low salary of $550 per year for an eight-hour service. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, in reply——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, has not the gentleman occupied more than five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already occupied five minutes on his amendment, and, of course, can not proceed except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want to cut the gentleman from Missouri off from any reasonable discussion of this question, but I submit to the committee that more time has been occupied in general debate on this bill than on any bill since I have been a Member of this House. I have been unusually liberal in granting time to everyone. I am going to give the gentleman from Missouri time to continue his remarks at this time, if he wishes to do so, but I want to serve notice that hereafter I shall refuse unanimous consent to anyone to speak for more than five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I think, however, that I occupy less time than almost any Member of the House. I only want to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who says that there was no evidence before the committee that these machines cost $3,000 per annum.

I find on page 120 of the hearings, just handed to me, a question by Mr. STAFFORD:

> Mr. STAFFORD. You described one form of arrangement you had here in Washington with the carriers. You did not describe the other.
> Mr. GRANDFIELD. The other is a contract for three machines, to be operated sixteen hours a day, the company to keep the machines in repair and to keep a reserve machine in case of breakdowns, and to furnish two drivers for each motor car, so that each man would not have to work in excess of eight hours. We did not want to risk a carrier on the rear end of a car driven by a chauffeur who had been on duty sixteen hours. I think the price is something like $3,000 for each machine per annum.

So I was not mistaken; but the gentleman from Wisconsin is the one who was mistaken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not specially object to gathering the mails by automobile process. I do not believe, however, that any man can demonstrate to the committee that it is the cheaper method.

If we are going to employ automobiles, let us pay what they are worth and no more. That is all I want. Since my attention has been called to the fact that it requires two men working eight hours a day each for one of these automobiles, I want to ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by making it $2,400 instead of $1,400.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. That will give each man at least $75 per month, and allow $50 per month for wear and tear of a machine that I do not believe is worth to exceed $500. I believe the Government could buy one of them for that.

Now, gentlemen, in all seriousness I put it up to you, Do you want to save the Government something in this matter? If you do, adopt my amendment, and you will at least save $600 per year on each one of these machines.

Mr. PARSONS. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to express my dissent to the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the time is coming when the pneumatic-tube service in New York can be discontinued and the work done by automobile service. There are certain parts of New York where automobiles may do the work. There are certain hours of the night when they may do the work. But in the business hours of the day you can not run automobiles through the crowded streets of New York and do the work that is now being done by the pneumatic tubes. This system that is being tried in New York has already given rise to some complaint. One of these automobiles in New York, running through the crowded streets on the east side, knocked down and killed a child only two weeks ago. While you may be able to do away with some of the pneumatic tubes, you will never be able to do away with them in the crowded business districts. I append a recent article in a New York newspaper showing that already in the brief time that the automobile service has been tried there one serious accident has occurred:

"NOT HURT," BUT SHE DIES—NOT A SCRATCH ON CHILD HIT BY MAIL AUTO—HOSPITAL PUZZLED.

Mary O'Reilly, 7 years old, who was run down by a mail automobile last night in Third avenue at Seventy-fourth street, said she was not hurt and asked to go home.

"Please don't arrest that man," she added, pointing to the driver, "he didn't mean to hurt me." So Policeman Bierman took the chauffeur's name and address, Joseph F. Mitchell, 509 West Fifty-second street, and let him go on his way with the mail.

The policeman insisted on sending Mary to the Presbyterian Hospital, though she was not scratched. She had been there just one hour when she died. The hospital folk said they couldn't account for it, except by undetected internal wounds she might have sustained.

The little girl was the daughter of John O'Reilly, of 219 East Seventy-fourth street. On hearing of her death the police at once began a search for Mitchell, the chauffeur.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, before a vote is taken on this amendment I want to call the attention of this committee to this one fact: When the recommendations of a committee in an appropriation bill are overridden on the floor, there should certainly be good and substantial reasons for so doing. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] has made a proposition here upon which he was so little informed that he offered an amendment limiting the appropriation to $1,400 a year. When he got some of the facts connected with the case he increased the amount to $2,400 a year. If he were further informed, I have no doubt that he would sustain the action of the committee. Any such proposition as this should be voted down without any other reason than that. I ask for a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HAMLIN, on a division there were—ayes 30, noes 62.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, simply for the purpose of supplementing what my colleague [Mr. PARSONS] has said about the pneumatic-tube service. The postal service in the large cities is a highly profitable service. When you remember that this service must compete with the telegraph, the telephone, and the district messenger service, everything that can be done for speed in that part of the service which is profitable ought to be done. I stood in the basement of the New York post-office and saw them dispatch by the pneumatic tube, in the regular course of business, a card addressed to the postmaster in Brooklyn, some miles distant. That card was inclosed in an envelope inclosed in a carrier, sent over to Brooklyn, taken out, taken up to the postmaster's office, stamped there, reinclosed in another envelope, brought down, put in another carrier, and was back to the basement in the New York post-office in, I think, six and one-half minutes.

Mr. MANN. That was a trial, was it not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; it was not.

Mr. MANN. An effort for speed?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. It was not in the ordinary course of business?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It was in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was not at the other end of the line.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I was at one end of the line. I could not be in two places at the same time. The gentleman was not there and he does not know.

Mr. MANN. There is no postmaster in New York who answers his correspondence that quickly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I did not say that the postmaster answered it. I said it was taken up to the postmaster's office, stamped there and returned. I am trying to be quite as accurate as the gentleman ever is.

Mr. MANN. It could not be stamped and returned unless it was a trial trip.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It was not a trial trip at all. I was there and the gentleman was not. It went in the regular routine the same as any other message would have gone, and was returned.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Do they spend their time sending cards through the pneumatic tubes for fun?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Of course they do not. My colleagues Mr. FORNES and Mr. GOULDEN were with me at the time.

Mr. MANN. It was not a trial trip?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not at all. It went along on the regular trip.

Mr. MANN. Are the gentleman and his colleagues there all the time?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; we leave that close supervision of postal affairs in cities to the gentleman from Illinois, who has nothing else to do. [Laughter.] Adding to what my colleague has said about automobiles, I want to say that while they are all right in the summer time, there is nothing more pathetic than an automobile in the streets of a large city clogged with snow. Now, my colleague from the northern end of the State [Mr. MALBY] has called my attention to another disadvantage of automobiles. Take away the pneumatic-tube service and it increases the traffic on the street. The United States Government has the right of way, and to fill the street full of mail wagons is thereby to tremendously impede other traffic that has a right to exist in the streets of large cities. You can not send automobile service over a route 11 and 12 miles long the way you can pneumatic-tube service, and as long as the city service is profitable, as long as the service is increasing each year, do not do anything to decrease the efficiency, so that the business men in the cities will be driven to the telegraph, to the telephone, to the district messenger, or any competitor of the postal service which pays in Chicago, in New York, and every other large city.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to 22 mechanics, at not exceeding $900 each, $19,800.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16 strike out lines 12, 13, and 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For compensation of 22 mechanics, not exceeding $1,000 each, $22,000.

Mr. WEEKS. To that amendment I reserve a point of order.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the reading of the amendment is a sufficient argument for its adoption. Nine hundred dollars is not enough for a mechanic to live on in the city, and the postmaster ought to be able to pay them $1,000 instead of $900. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York if these mechanics' compensation is fixed by law?

Mr. OLCOTT. I do not understand that it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $7,070,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served entirely by the extension of rural delivery service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star-route service for a patronage which is already entirely served by rural delivery service: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable without advertising therefor.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, line 11, after the word "million," insert the words "one hundred."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the object and purpose of the amendment is to increase the appropriation for star routes by $100,000. I desire to call attention to the fact that the original estimate for this service was $7,201,000. Later the Second Assistant Postmaster-General stated to the committee that, after having examined the bids which had been received up to that time, he was of the opinion that this service could be carried on for a smaller sum, and the estimate was reduced by $141,000. The amendment which I offer leaves the appropriation $41,000 below the original estimate.

I think there can be no question, Mr. Chairman, but that, if this amendment is not adopted, there will be a deficiency in this item. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General estimated, at the time he appeared before the committee, that the increased cost, as shown by the bids which had just been received for the fourth contract section, would be about $166,000. I understand that since these bids have been further examined it has been discovered that a very considerable percentage of them could not be accepted, because they are considered too high, and the probability is that the increased cost over the last contract period will be largely in excess of the amount estimated. My opinion is that it will be necessary to still further increase this item in order to meet the demands of the service, and, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss very briefly this most important service.

We have spent days and days here talking about the employees of the postal service who dwell in the cities. They are well represented on the floor of this House. We have heard amendment after amendment proposed to increase the salaries of men who are already receiving upward of $1,000. We have heard many eloquent pleas, and very proper ones, I imagine, in the majority of cases, for increases of salaries; and yet, Mr. Chairman, there is one class of people employed in the postal service in whose behalf no voice has been raised on this floor, and they are far and away the most miserably paid employees in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will not invoke against this discussion, which is entirely new, the five-minute rule that he announced a moment ago. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more, in view of the fact that the claims of city employees have been presented for days and these country employees have had no hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the contract system is enforced on the star routes. The result of that is that the average star-route carrier earns the magnificent salary of $1.74 per day for himself and his team. He earns, if he works every working day in the year and covers 24 miles every day, the magnificent sum of $588.

Mr. MANN. Is that a specific salary or an average?

Mr. MONDELL. That is an average.

Mr. MANN. There is no salary, is there?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the average earnings, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. That is all done on bidding, is it not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and if the gentleman will not take too much of my five minutes I shall explain how it comes to be so low. No one can deny that an American citizen ought not to be compelled to work and to work his team and care for it for $1.74 a day, and if this contract system were carried on in the manner in which a contract system is ordinarily carried on, these men would receive decent, or fairly decent, wages.

But since we have come to have seven deliveries a day in the cities and rural free deliveries in the more thickly settled rural communities, the sparsely settled communities served by star routes have been entirely forgotten, and the attitude of the department toward this service has been to continually force down the cost of the service. The department does not let contracts to the lowest bidder. If, in the opinion of the department, the lowest bidder is too high, they readvertise; and if in their opinion the lowest bid received on the second readvertisement is too high, they again readvertise; and so time and time again they readvertise, hoping to get a lower bid. Finally, if no bid is received which the department considers low enough, and they will not consider a bid that pays $2 a day on an ordinary route for a man and a team, and when the bidders are thoroughly tired out and disgusted, the department proceeds to send an agent through the country and by a more or less alluring tale to some farmer's boy as to the possibilities of gain through the carrying of passengers and express, finally deludes the victim into taking a contract at a price very much less than he can afford to do it for; or, what is more often the case, the people to be served, after two or three advertisements have been had, finally conclude that it is utterly impossible to let the contract at a price the department will accept and agree to chip in and pay part of the cost, and one farmer gives the carrier his dinner, another his supper, and another proposes to take care of his horses. I have on my desk now one case, the longest line in my State, an unusually long one, where the lowest bid was $10,000, and where, before the bid was submitted, I am told, the citizens of the town where the route originates entered into a contract with the man making the bid to save him free of loss up to $5,000. I have no disposition to criticise the officials of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General's office in this matter further than to say I think they have a mistaken idea of their duty. I am certain Congress does not expect that any of our citizens shall be compelled to pay for the mail service they receive, except as they pay postage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more in behalf of the star-route carrier.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming has the right to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and I shall object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming, and I would like to ask the gentleman a question in reference to how they arrive at this amount—these lettings, and so forth.

Mr. MONDELL. At the amount paid?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. They arrive at the amount of pay by the cost of the route per mile. The average cost per mile is 7½ cents.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was attempting to explain a subject, and I did not get all of his statement.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, further replying to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say that the pay is fixed by the necessities of the people that must have mail service. The department insists that we are expending so much money in other ways, for pneumatic-tube service in New York, for automobiles in Washington, or steamboat service, and for rural free-delivery service, that it can not afford to pay a decent price for carrying the mails to people who happen to live in thinly, sparsely settled districts, and therefore the people in my State often pay a considerable portion of the cost of the delivery of their mail by agreeing with the carrier to save him from any loss incurred in carrying out his contract.

There are sections of routes in my State on which the snow is sometimes 15 feet deep——

Mr. FASSETT. How thick are the inhabitants?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And where the carrier receives 8 cents a mile——

Mr. MANN. Does he go under or go over?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). For carrying the mail. Just this time in the spring he can neither go under nor go over oftentimes, and therefore he is liable to being fined double the amount of his contract. In the winter, when the snow is hard, he goes over on snowshoes, and later, when the snow is off, he goes under, over the roads.

Mr. GAINES. Is not the trouble that the contractor himself bids too low for the work?

Mr. MONDELL. The trouble is that the department will not let a contract, as I have said, will not let a contract to the lowest bidder if the price is over about 7 cents a mile on an ordinary route, over 8 cents a mile on a difficult route, or over 10 cents a mile on a rough, mountainous, snowy route 7,000 to 8,000 feet above the sea level, with snow mountain high in the winter. They will not let a contract; they readvertise over and over, until the people of the community, concluding it is impossible to get the service unless they help pay for it, chip in to help pay the contractor, or, what is worse than that, the department, often, rather than pay as much as 9 cents a mile. Nine cents a mile—think of it!—for a man and team and wagon in that western country, where the cost of grain and wages is high. That means about $1.91 a day. If they must pay as high as 8 or 9 cents a mile, they reduce the frequency of the service, give the people not seven times a day service, as in New York, but a service once in seven days.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to understand the gentleman. Did the gentleman say there was snow in his State on the 4th of March?

Mr. MONDELL. There was in Washington last year, if my memory serves me right, and there is in the Teton Pass to-day, I am sure.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri to ask a question of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to say the Government would not pay 9 cents a mile.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there are one or two routes in my State, known as "snowshoe routes," that extend more than 7,000 feet above the sea level, where they pay as much as 10 cents a mile, but ordinarily they will not pay above 7 cents a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. I will not ask an extension of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 55, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by steamboat or other power-boat routes, $800,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 24, after the word "hundred," insert "and fifteen," so it will read "$815,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How is it the department holds that fraternal journals can not carry advertising matter?

Mr. MANN. What has that got to do with this?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is about as proper a time as anywhere else, and I want to know.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has given a hearing on the subject of fraternal journals on their request that they be given the second-class mail rate. That hearing has been sent to the Post-Office Department, which will make a reply very shortly, and then the committee will consider the bill pro and con. Up to this time we have not received the reply from the department to the arguments that have been made in favor of giving that class of periodicals the second-class rate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do we understand the committee will report and some bill will be passed later in the session?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee will consider the bill and report on it as soon as other business will permit.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail bags, metal for mail-bag attachments, cord fasteners, label cases, and material necessary for manufacture and repairing of equipment, and for incidental expenses pertaining thereto, $300,000: Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to use so much of the sum, not exceeding $5,000, as may be deemed necessary for the purchase of material, and the manufacture in the mail-bag repair shop of such small quantities of distinctive equipment as may be required by other executive departments, and for service in Alaska, Porto Rico, Philippine Islands, Hawaii, or other island possessions, and for such special equipment for testing and for other purposes in connection with the reduction in the weight of mail equipment: Provided further, That not exceeding $5,000 of this amount may be used by the Postmaster-General for the temporary employment of expert service to examine into the methods employed in conducting the affairs of the mail-bag shop and the lock shop.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that. I would like an explanation of the language in lines 15 and 16 in the first proviso.

Mr. WEEKS. That, Mr. Chairman, is a part of the present law. I do not know what the history is, but it was in last year's bill and has been in other bills so far as I know for several years.

Mr. GARRETT. It is not subject to the point of order possibly, then?

Mr. WEEKS. I think not.

Mr. GARRETT. Then, I move to strike out the last word, if it is not subject to a point of order. I do not understand this:

Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to use so much of the sum, not exceeding $5,000, as may be deemed necessary for the purchase of material, and the manufacture in the mail-bag repair shop of such small quantities of distinctive equipment as may be required by other executive departments—

Does that mean distinctive mail equipment?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that that means distinctive mail equipment, and that that proviso was inserted originally on account of some ruling made by the Comptroller. The Government does not manufacture mail bags except in unusual cases. Mail bags are manufactured by contract, but in this case the Government does manufacture these mail bags that are required for this unusual service. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. GARRETT. It is the understanding of the gentleman that this refers to mail equipment of some sort?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. If the gentleman will read the language of the second proviso he will find it evidently means postal equipment.

Mr. GARRETT. That second proviso does, of course.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It refers back to the first proviso, I think.

Mr. GARRETT. It looks to me as if the language might include anything.

Mr. WEEKS. It is intended, Mr. Chairman, to manufacture this special equipment for the Alaskan, Porto Rican, or Philippine Islands services.

Mr. GARRETT. Or any other executive department, as to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The department has its mail carried between the departments and the post-office in a special character of bag.

Mr. GARRETT. The point I wanted to ascertain was whether or not it refers to mail equipment. I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out the words "Philippine Islands," in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 18, strike out the words "Philippine Islands."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to my friend from Indiana that the striking out of the words "Philippine Islands" will not change the provision in the slightest degree unless you strike out "or other island possessions."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The chief purpose of my amendment is to get information. The postal service in the Philippine Islands is altogether under the control of the insular government. The revenues go into the insular treasury, and the expenses are paid out of the insular revenues. The postal service in the Philippine Islands is entirely outside of the control or regulation of Congress, and it occurred to me we might establish rather a questionable precedent, at least, to provide out of federal revenues for increasing the facilities of the service in the Philippines. The Philippine Islands are exceptional in that respect.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I regret to have to confess to the committee that I am not familiar with the original reason for inserting this in the post-office appropriation bill. It was in the last year's bill. No recommendation was made by the department, and I assume that it was desirable to furnish the special equipment for this service, and, as no contract had been made for it, that it should be manufactured in the mail-bag shop. I do not see now, basing my opinion on the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], why any change should be made.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, the only reason is that the Philippine service is altogether independent from the federal postal service.

Mr. FASSETT. I am not informed, but it occurs to me that this is not for the Philippine Islands' use at all, but it is for the use of our own governmental department in relation to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be, but the postal service in the other islands is under the control of the United States.

Mr. FASSETT. It can not be very much, for $5,000 is the total limit.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The amount is inconsequential; but if we now provide an appropriation for $5,000 out of our Treasury that may be used for providing equipment for use in the Philippines we may be called upon in the future to appropriate a substantial sum for the service there.

Mr. FASSETT. I assume it does. I think it is for the use of the equipment service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not so understand it. It may be used for equipment for the service in the Philippine Archipelago. I am not insisting upon the amendment, but I wanted to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Philippine service occupies a different status from the service of the other islands.

Mr. PAYNE. I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think it can be contended for one minute that this provision applies to the equipment of the Philippine service, because——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. PAYNE. This proviso is:

That out of this appropriation the Postmaster-General is authorized to use so much of the sum, not exceeding $5,000, as may be deemed necessary for the purchase of material and the manufacture in the mail-bag repair shop of such small quantities of distinctive equipment as may be required by other executive departments, and for service in Alaska, Porto Rico, etc.

For the executive department of the Government for service in those islands.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For service in those islands.

Mr. PAYNE. I should say that is what it means.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is possible that is the interpretation put upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to labor employed in the mail-bag repair shop at Washington, D. C., and Chicago, Ill., $110,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have in mind the purpose of asking the gentleman about this repair shop. Will the gentleman having charge of this bill inform me how much of this money has been spent here in the District of Columbia and how much in the city of Chicago, if the gentleman is in possession of that information?

Mr. WEEKS. Substantially all the money has been spent in the District of Columbia. There are very few men employed in the Chicago shop; but it is the purpose of the department to increase that repair shop so as to repair all mail equipment which comes from points in the West.

Mr. SABATH. I asked that question, Mr. Chairman, for this reason: I understand that all of this work is being done here. The department brings all its empties to Washington, which costs the Government large sums of money annually, and I believe that this work could be done in the city of Chicago and the Government would save a great many thousands of dollars which it now expends for hauling the empties from the Middle West and western sections here. I ask the chairman whether it is not his opinion that it would be much better if that work was done in the city of Chicago?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I agree to some extent with the gentleman from Illinois; and it is the purpose of the department to extend its Chicago branch for repairing equipment that originates west of that point.

Mr. SABATH. So that is the intention?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me, the very purpose of establishing the branch office in Chicago was that it should take care of the equipment that needed repair in the western territory.

Mr. SABATH. They are not now, but will in the future?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are at present. The very purpose of the subrepair shop at Chicago was to take care of the equipment that originated in that territory.

Mr. SABATH. It came to my notice last year, and I called the postmaster's attention to the unnecessary waste, and I suggested that the work be done in Chicago, which would save the Government a large sum of money which it now pays out for unnecessary hauling.

Mr. STAFFORD. Undoubtedly that will be done.

Mr. SABATH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question for information. Is this repairing of the mail bags at Chicago and here done under contract, or does the Government employ the people?

Mr. WEEKS. The Government employs the people.

Mr. HAMLIN. I supposed that was true. Can the gentleman state the average wage paid per day to these employees?

Mr. WEEKS. I think so. The scale of wages, Mr. Chairman, ranges from $1.75 to $4.75 a day. The $4.75 men are superintendents and foremen.

Mr. HAMLIN. The men that actually do the work get $1.75 a day?

Mr. WEEKS. There are 172 people employed in these shops. There are some women who are paid, I am informed, $1.75 a day.

Mr. MANN. Are there no women working for less than $1.75 a day?

Mr. WEEKS. According to the testimony at the hearing, there are not.

Mr. MANN. Then the wages have been raised in the last few years.

Mr. SABATH. It is necessary that the wages be raised. The people could not live on the old scale of wages, as the necessities of life are constantly increasing in cost.

Mr. WEEKS. I find that there are people employed at $20 a month. I suppose they are cleaners who work a few hours a day.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail locks and keys, chains, tools, machinery and material necessary for manufacturing and repairing same, and for incidental expenses pertaining thereto; also for making in the mail-lock repair shop such metal attachments as may be needed for use in the manufacture and repair of mail equipment, $10,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 13, strike out "ten thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "eight thousand five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to labor employed in the mail-lock repair shop at Washington, D. C., $35,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers the following amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, lines 15 and 16, strike out "thirty-five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty-six thousand five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $45,500,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the usual increase has been provided for this service—the increase that is provided in the bill year after year?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, there is a reduction in the recommendation as compared with last year. There was appropriated in the bill for the current year $46,568,000. Of this it is estimated that there will be unexpended at the end of the year $1,507,000. The expenditure for this service for this year will be $45,060,000. This is the year for the weighing of the fourth-contract section. The reason there is such a balance for the current year is that it was estimated that there would be an increase in the first-contract section, which was weighed last spring, of about $900,000. As a matter of fact, instead of there being an increase there was a decrease of about $500,000, which accounts for the large balance on hand. Figuring along the same line, it is estimated that there may not be any increase in the weighings in the fourth-contract section, in which case it would only require $45,060,000 for this service for 1911; but, presuming that there may be some increase, we have allowed $45,500,000, which is about $1,100,000 less than last year.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then the small decrease in the appropriation was not occasioned by any reduction in the pay to the railroads for this service?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; there have been reductions made in the pay to the railroads. Since the report of the Postal Commission in 1907 there have been reductions in three or four instances; first, by a change in the divisor; second, by a change in the rate of pay for railway post-office cars; third, in transporting equipment by freight instead of by mail; and, fourth, the change in the rate paid for a weight of mail of more than 5,000 pounds.

Mr. HAMLIN. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I mean, taking this year as compared with last year, there is no reduction on account of any reduced pay to the railroads between this year and last year?

Mr. WEEKS. No; none at all.

Mr. HAMLIN. And none is contemplated by the committee in its report?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will state that under the act of 1907, which provided for a reduction in railway mail pay, as the gentleman knows, there are four weighing divisions in the United States, and it would require four years for that act to have its full effect. I believe that this year we will weigh the last of the divisions, and the last one that will be affected by the act of 1907. Up to this time that division has not been affected by the act of 1907. So the weighings that have gone on year after year have resulted in reductions in railway-mail pay.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. The proposition I want to develop here is whether the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have made any attempt to ascertain whether the pay of the railroads for carrying the mails could or ought to be reduced. It has been charged that we are paying the railroad companies too much money for the service they render the Government. I want to know if the committee has attempted to ascertain whether that is true or not.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say that an item is about to be read in the bill appropriating $10,000 to handle certain reports in answer to questions that have been sent out by the department to all the railroad companies. The information is being received at the department and it will be handled and put in proper shape to be sent to Congress at the earliest possible moment. No legislation has been attempted by the committee in the way of reducing railway mail pay at this session.

Mr. HAMLIN. The matter has been agitated to my knowledge ever since I have been in Congress, six years, and has the committee never yet attempted to reach a conclusion on that proposition?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, yes; in the act of 1907 we did that very thing, we reduced the railway mail pay.

Mr. HAMLIN. You reduced it by changing the divisor, but you did not reduce the rate for the amount actually carried.

Mr. FINLEY. That is exactly what we did do. We reduced railway mail pay in 1907.

Mr. WEEKS. We can furnish the gentleman with the figures if he desires to have them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the act of 1907 we reduced the tonnage rates for carrying the mail on railroads where the average daily weight was in excess of five thousand and up to forty-eight thousand 5 per cent, and where the weights were above 48,000 pounds, 10 per cent. We also reduced the pay for rental of post-office cars, which had been in operation since 1873, from $50 for the larger-sized car to $40 for a daily line of travel. These reductions, so far as the tonnage pay is concerned, averaged from 5 to 7 per cent, and the reduction of the so-called "rental" of the railway post-office cars amounted, on an average, to 16 per cent.

The reduction on the total transportation pay, based on the tonnage basis, amounts to $1,740,494. The reduction based on the reduced price for carriage of the railway post-office cars amounts to $935,974, making an aggregate reduction of $2,676,486.

Immediately on the enforcement of the act of 1907 the department, under department order No. 412, applied the divisor proposition, using seven days as a divisor instead of six. In other words, in ascertaining the average daily weight of the mail it divided by the actual number of days the mail was carried rather than by the secular days, exclusive of Sunday. That resulted in a saving in the three territorial divisions—because it did not take effect in all divisions until the time of the weighing of the mail—aggregating $3,323,060. On the same basis of reduction, by reason of this divisor proposition, it is estimated that the pay in the fourth section, which is now being weighed, will amount to $1,394,561.52, making a total of $7,396,090.

Now, I wish to direct the gentleman's attention to the report of the Wolcott commission of ten years ago. The majority of the commission reported against, or found that the charges by the railroads for carriage of the mail were not excessive. The minority of that commission recommended a reduction that would aggregate not more than $3,000,000 a year. Congress declined to reduce the railway mail pay when the report was presented. In 1907 Congress passed a law reducing the tonnage and railway post-office car pay, which aggregated $2,676,468, without taking into consideration the further reductions which were directed at that time by withdrawing equipment from the mails when they could be shipped in freightable lots, which is estimated by the department to aggregate over $800,000.

The result of the divisor proposition made another reduction in the railway pay of $4,700,000, or a grand total of reduction in railway-mail pay of $7,394,000. Adding to that amount the $800,000 of saving by reason of taking the mail equipment out of the mails when it could be shipped by freight and you have a total saving in railway-mail pay of more than $8,000,000. And yet the commission that investigated this subject for more than two years, on which there were men of the highest standing, reported that the then rates were not excessive. One member is to-day one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Moody, who gave the subject most careful consideration. He said, in a lengthy speech on February 5, 1901, in this House, that he could not bring himself around to the conclusion that the railway-mail pay should be reduced at all.

Yet, following the recommendation of the Postal Commission, that this body created back in 1905, the Post-Office Committee brought into this House in 1907, in the bill for the year 1908, this recommendation, providing for a reduction of pay of tonnage rates on those lines that carry the heaviest amount—namely, from 5,000 to 48,000 pounds per day of 5 per cent, and of 10 per cent for those that carry in excess of that, so that the aggregate reduction of railway mail pay is more than $8,000,000 from what it was prior to the time when Congress, three years ago, caused that reduction to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the gentleman is posted upon this proposition perhaps better than any other man in the House, and I want to ask him this direct question. It has been charged frequently, and I am sure that every Member has received information from all over the country in letters and in the press, that the Government is paying the railroads about four times as much to carry the mail as the express companies are charged by the railroads for practically similar service. I want to know what the gentleman thinks as to the correctness of that proposition. Is that true?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when this subject was under consideration in the House at the time when the Walcott commission made its report——

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not talking about ten years ago. How is it to-day?

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the only commission that gave this subject thorough consideration, the thorough consideration that it deserves. At that time Mr. Moody, then a Member of the House, directed attention to the hearings that had been taken by the commission, comparing the payment to the Illinois Central Railroad Company by the American Express Company on space basis and the charges that the Government was paying for carriage of the mail. He stated in that speech that I have referred to that the Government, in that instance, was paying a less rate per mile for the carriage of the mail than the express companies were for their service. There has been a great hue and cry raised against the rates paid for these traveling post-office cars, cars for which we pay a stated amount, based on mileage covered, in addition to the tonnage rate, where the mails are distributed by the clerks while in transit. These 60-foot cars weigh in the neighborhood of 50 to 60 tons, and the latest design of steel car weighs in the neighborhood of 65 tons.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not now. I wish to explain this subject while I am on it. I decline to yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit one more question, and then he can explain both questions together?

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman want to admit that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the House has never investigated this real live, burning question for a period of ten years? Why does he go back ten years? Why does he not give us some present-day information on the proposition?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we have had investigations since then.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then why does the gentleman go back to the Moody report?

Mr. STAFFORD. That commission of ten years ago collected data and information that is valuable to-day, and the Postal Commission, which was created five years ago and upon whose recommendation we acted, investigated the matter in connection with the recommendations and the hearings as collated by the Wolcott commission.

Mr. FASSETT. The difference in the quality of services rendered, when once set out, if it was fifty years ago, would be just as true to-day as it was then, and that difference does not need reinvestigation.

Mr. HAMLIN. It appears that, so far as the committee knows, the rates ten years ago are not the rates to-day.

Mr. FASSETT. That does not make any difference.

Mr. HAMLIN. It does.

Mr. STAFFORD. I just stated to the gentleman that the rates are not the same. We have made a radical reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Considerable criticism has been made of the rates paid for the carriage of mail in traveling post-office cars, averaging from $25 for a 40-foot car, to $40 for the 55-foot car, and over, but I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that in the carriage of mail in these traveling post-office cars the average amount of mail carried is less than 3 tons; for a 40-foot car the average, including equipment, is 2,028 pounds; for a 50-foot car, 3,126 pounds; and for a 60-foot car 5,668 pounds, according to the weighings had by the department over the entire postal service two years ago.

The average weight would amount to one and a half to two and a half tons. But I would remind Members that at the same time the railroad is giving us the advantage of a distributing post-office on wheels, and it is carrying a dead weight of from forty to fifty times the weight of the mail that is carried in them. Now, there is no question whatsoever that if the Government would ask the railroad company to furnish for its use a railroad post-office car that would be confined in its yards and would not be hauled it would not charge any such rates as that carried in the law, for it would only be entitled to a fair return on its investment. But the present rate includes the cost to the railroad for carrying dead weight forty to fifty times the weight of mail carried. Anyone who has estimated that the pay for these traveling post-offices in connection with the amount of mail carried in these cars will find that the average return to the railroad for this service is less than the average return they receive from passenger service.

The committee must separate from their minds the idea that we are merely paying for the rent of the car. We are paying the railroads for the carriage of forty to fifty times of dead weight over the little weight carried over the railroad when these railway postal cars are traveling. Now, in the case of express matter, the average weight of a car of express matter is from five to seven times that of the weight of mail in the ordinary post-office car, and it is no fair comparison to compare the returns of a compactly loaded express car with a mail car with merely one-eighth or one-tenth the load. Naturally, if the traveling post-office car was a storage car with eight to ten tons of mail, the railroads could afford to carry at a much less rate.

Mr. LLOYD. Why is it that the Government should pay these large sums for railway post-office cars when they haul the Pullman cars without expense to anybody?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, that is easily explained, because the Pullman Car Company furnishes their own equipment and the Government——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman ought to make an answer to that very quickly, that the railroad company uses the Pullman cars and collects fares from the passengers which the Pullman cars carry.

Mr. STAFFORD. I dare say that if the Government furnished the cars perhaps the railroad would not charge anything for the use, but the railroad would have to receive compensation based upon the small amount of mail that is carried in the car, which only averages from 1 to 2½ tons to the car. If all the mail was carried in bulk in solid mail cars, then unquestionably the rates could be reduced, but they are giving a service where there is a distribution of the mail on rails with a minimum amount of mail carried per car.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman does not wish the answer of the gentleman from Illinois to serve as your own in reply to that question in regard to the Pullman car, for it is a fact, as anybody knows, that if you ride in a Pullman car you have to pay for riding in the Pullman car, and it is also a fact that is very generally known that the railroads receive nothing whatever for hauling the Pullman car.

Mr, STAFFORD. But the railroads receive the same average return from passengers when traveling in Pullman cars, while from the traveling post-office car, if the railroads only received the tonnage rates, they would be receiving but a fraction of what the car could carry and would earn when stored to its usual capacity with packet express or baggage. You must not lose sight of the small weight carried in these cars as compared to the average load in other cars.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether in the payment for inland transportation by railroad routes—$45,500,000—it is all paid on the basis of weight?

Mr. WEEKS. It is; yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I notice in the report of increases under the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that there is an increase of $247,000 for the railway postal-car service. I would like to ask the gentleman if when the Government pays for a railway postal car, if controlling the car the Government still has to pay for the weight carried by the car?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, when a railway post-office car is used the rate of pay is determined by the weight. In addition to that, a charge is made for the car, provided the space used in the car is not less than 40 feet. If it is less than 40 feet; it is called a "compartment car," and no charge is made for it by the railroad. And, incidentally, I would like to say for the benefit of the committee, that the railroads furnish about as much car space for which they receive no pay whatever as they do space for which they are paid in the railway post-office cars.

Mr. HOBSON. I notice there is an increase for freight or expressage on postal supplies. Since the postal cars are not fully occupied—I understand perhaps only about 20 per cent of the cubical space is actually occupied—I would like to know whether these cars could not be used in their unoccupied space for the transportation of these supplies?

Mr. WEEKS. One of the principal reasons why a railway post-office car can not carry as much weight as an express car is because there is not as much available space. The tables and equipment that are used in handling the mails take up so much space in the car that it is impossible to carry the weight which would be carried in an express car, where there is no such equipment.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask the gentleman whether any investigations have been made looking toward the utilization of the space in the upper portions of the cars, like it is utilized, for instance, in the Pullman cars, or any other improvement of the railway car service, to get a larger benefit therefrom?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not informed on that point; but I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that the Post-Office Department has sent out a very comprehensive list of questions to railroads all over the country. The returns are commencing to come in. There is a provision in this bill for an appropriation of $10,000 to tabulate those returns. The department and the Post-Office Committee expect that when those returns are in we then will have information that has not been before obtainable.

Mr. HOBSON. Does that mean that the unused and unavailable space in the cars the Government pays for will be availed of?

Mr. WEEKS. I think that will be considered.

Mr. HOBSON. My question, stated in another way, is this: Whether the committee has taken up the question of payment on a basis of space instead of weight, or a combination of the two?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee has not taken up that question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it not true that the department takes up these matters with the railroad companies each year and never expects any returns or, at least, none are ever made, or conclusions reached on them? Is not that about the end of the attempt made to solve this proposition? Is not that the annual procedure on the part of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, it is not very gracious to criticise an inquiring mind, but the gentleman from Missouri has had explained to him in definite terms that we are not harking back to ten years ago for material to answer his question. The postal commisssion reported on this subject of rates, and recommended changes which have been made which have created a saving of something like $8,000,000 a year, all this since the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] came to Congress originally. Every effort is being made to reach a reasonable conclusion. The gentleman started his inquiry by asking for a comparison between the express rates and railway post-office rates. Now, there is some comparison in that they both use cars furnished by the railroads, but there are a great many conditions relating to those services which are not comparable at all. I have in my hand a letter from the department which states very material differences in the conditions under which this service is carried on, and, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that this letter be read by the Clerk and included in the RECORD, so that Members may be familiar with the department's explanation of the differences in the character of these two services.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1910.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Chairman Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry as to the difference between the service rendered the Post-Office Department by railroad companies in the carriage and handling of the mails, and that rendered express companies, I would state that from such information as we have been able to obtain in regard to the service rendered to express companies, the difference is substantially as follows:

The Post-Office Department requires the railroad company to take the mail from the post-office wherever the office is within 80 rods of the depot and the company has an agent, and in many cases to perform the terminal service regardless of the distance between the post-office and the station. Wherever the terminal service is taken up by the department, by means of regulation or screen-wagon service, the contractor delivers the mail at a specified place at the depot, and from that point the railroad employees transport it to the cars, and if the amount is so great that it would impose a hardship upon the postal employees to load and store this mail, the railroad company is called upon to furnish porters to do the work. Where the mail messenger or contractor can drive direct to the cars, he does so. The express companies haul all of their matter to the railroad stations and put it in the cars, using their own employees and their own trucks.

The cars furnished the Post-Office Department and those furnished the express companies differ very materially. The former are built according to specifications furnished by the department, and are fully equipped with letter cases, paper racks, drawers, and lockers for registered mail and supplies, and all of the equipment necessary for the distribution of mail en route. The cars furnished the express companies have very little, if any, interior furnishings, and are more like the cars used for the transportation of baggage. In both cases the cars used are owned by the railroad company.

The number of employees transported for the Post-Office Department is very much greater than for the express companies. There are frequently five or six clerks in the postal cars, and on fast mail trains, where there are two or three working cars to a train, the number runs up as high as 23. The express seldom requires more than two men in a car.

The Post-Office Department claims as much space at depots without specific payment therefor as may be required for the storing and handling of mail in transit. The express companies are required to pay the railroad companies for all space used at depots.

On smaller lines a separate apartment must be furnished for the mails other than baggage mails. The express matter is usually placed in the baggage car.

Upon arrival at terminals the railroad company may be required to unload a mail car, if the quantity is such as to impose a hardship upon the clerks, and to see that it is loaded into the contractor's wagons; or, if the terminal service devolves upon the railroad company, that it is delivered into the post-office. The express company unloads and handles its own matter.

The railroad and express companies frequently use a joint employee to handle baggage and express, thereby economizing in cost of help. That can very seldom be done in connection with the postal service.

The railroad company has charge of all baggage mails in transit and receives them into and delivers them from the cars. It also handles other mails when necessary to transfer them between cars or trains. It is held responsible for reasonable care in their transportation. Deductions are made for failures to perform service according to contract, and fines are imposed for delinquencies. The company is required to keep a record of all pouch mails carried on trains in charge of their employees and handled at stations where more than one regular exchange pouch is involved and no mail transfer clerk is located, and to prepare and forward shortage slips when a pouch is due and not received. They are required to make monthly affidavits as to performance of service. It is understood that the company never assumes control of express matter. The department is not informed as to the terms of contracts between railroad and express companies, and therefore can not state what responsibility is imposed as to transportation.

Mail cranes for the exchange of mail at points where trains do not stop are erected and kept in repair by and at the expense of the railroad company, whose employees must hang the mail bag on the crane and adjust it for catching at points where the company provides side service. The mail catchers are also furnished by them. No service of this character is rendered express companies.

A railroad company is required by law to carry the mails upon any train that may be run, when so ordered by the Postmaster-General, without extra charge therefor, and as a result the mails are carried on the fastest trains and with great frequency. Express matter is not as a rule carried on the fast limited passenger trains, nor with the frequency with which mails are carried.

In this connection your attention is invited to pages 84 to 94, 516, 517, 860 to 863, part 1, and pages 687 to 696, part 2, of the testimony before the congressional commission which investigated the postal service in 1900—Wolcott-Loud commission.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I rise for the purpose of challenging one portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, or rather amplifying them in regard to the history of the legislation of recent years concerning reductions in railway mail pay.

The Wolcott commission made its report about ten years ago. It is a voluminous report. Congress took no action upon it. In 1907 another commission, known as the "Penrose-Overstreet commission," made a report in regard to second-class matter, and proposed an increase in the rate of this class of mail matter. In connection with their proposal in regard to second-class matter, the Penrose-Overstreet commission proposed a reduction of railway mail pay. That proposal was this: That where the average daily weight of mail carried on a railroad route was above 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds, it should be reduced 5 per cent; and an additional 5 per cent reduction was provided where the average daily weight was above 48,000 pounds. That commission also included in its propositions, and in terms in its proposed bill, this: That the department should continue to compute the weighing of the mail for average daily weight as it had done for years.

Now, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House in 1907 brought out four propositions, not one. It brought out, first, a proposition to reduce the pay to the railways where the average daily weight was above 5,000 pounds; second, it brought out a proposition to reduce to some extent the pay we make for car service; third, it brought out a proposition to take certain equipments out of the mail; fourth, it brought out a proposition to change the divisor. Now, the House accepted the first reduction, that regarding the average daily weight above 5,000 pounds. It accepted the elimination of certain equipments from the weight of mail, and it also accepted the reduction of car pay. But Congress refused to accept the change in the divisor; and, by a legislative trick which was never tried in this body before, and will never be tried again, these sections carrying reductions in railway-mail pay were so manipulated that two of the propositions were taken out of the bill and, by a vote of the House, placed in the hands of the clerk and reinserted in the bill after its final passage and engrossment; the whole maneuver being for the purpose of preventing the adoption of a new divisor and with the result of keeping the pay to the railroads $5,000,000 above what it ought to have been by all rules of arithmetic for the computation of averages. The change in divisor was made by the department afterwards.

Now, as the proposition stands to-day, the pay to the railroads in the last three years has been cut annually, in round numbers, first, $1,000,000 on car pay; second, $2,000,000 on weight, and nearly $5,000,000 on change of computation in the matter of the divisor, or altogether $8,000,000. The elimination of certain equipment also increased the saving. That amount would have increased greatly annually as years went by if the correction had not been made then.

There is a great deal of profitable study possible in the matter of railway mail pay. No one can solve the problem in a day; no set of men will solve it in a year.

We start with a certain rate as a norm, and until somebody wiser than we are arises in this country to tell us whether the first rate, which we have taken as a norm, is right or not, no one can ever tell the extent we are overpaying the railroads, or with finality whether we are overpaying them at all.

We pay for the first rate on the carriage of mail $42.75 per mile per annum for a weight of 200 pounds average daily weight. In lots of mail over 200 pounds up to 5,000 pounds we pay on a sliding scale. When we get to 5,000 pounds average daily weight we pay $171 for the 5,000 pounds.

Now, if we are going into the matter of computation, I think this change can be made: The New York Central, from New York to Buffalo, carries some 350,000 pounds of mail daily. In the old days, under the old divisor, it carried 411,000 pounds of mail. To-day it carries 350,0000 pounds, and inasmuch as this 350,000 pounds is above the average daily weight of 48,000 pounds, we pay the New York Central in this way, and not in the way that is generally supposed. First, we take 5,000 pounds, and we pay for that $171; then we subtract 5,000 pounds from the 350,000 pounds and have remaining 345,000 pounds; then we subtract from the 345,000 pounds 43,000 pounds, and for that 43,000 pounds we pay at the rate of $20.30 per ton per mile per annum.

For the remaining 302,000 pounds we pay $19.24 per ton per mile per annum. It is generally believed in this House that we pay the New York Central for the transportation of 350,000 pounds of mail average daily weight at the rate of $19.24 per ton of 2,000 pounds. We do nothing of the kind. We pay $171 for the first 5,000 pounds, which is considerably above the rate of $20.30 per ton. I think that is one of the things in the system that suggests the possibility and the justice of a change.

As most of the Members of this House know, there are other things in the system that I think should be changed. The matter of the time of weighing is of great importance. No man can tell how much we would cut the pay of the railroads by changing the weighing period, but there is no question in my mind that we would cut it very heavily by doing so. Speaking for myself, I think the weighing period ought to be changed. January is a very heavy month in mail weights. February is still heavier. March is, in my opinion, the heaviest month in the year for mail weights.

[The time of Mr. MURDOCK having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. MURDOCK. The average weight of mail begins to drop off in April and May; it rises a little in June, sinks very low in July and August, and in September the mails again begin to rise in weight, and in one part of the country—in the first weighing section, the New England-New York section—the weight of the mail rises prodigiously in September, differing in that respect from all other parts of the country. In September and October the mails are still increasing in weight, in November still increasing, and in December, the Christmas month, they are very high; but the mail weights of the country are not as heavy in the Christmas month of December as they are in January, February, and March.

Mr. STAFFORD. At present the one hundred and five days in which the mails are weighed begins about February 20 and end somewhere in June. Can the gentleman suggest any other period of one hundred and five days which would represent a better average period of the year?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; and I will get to that proposition. We have a year in the several months of which the mail varies in weight. We have never had in this country a whole year's weighing of the mail. The figures that I have given and the belief that I have are based largely on the time when our postal receipts come in—when we sell the postage out of which we get our revenues. As we now weigh the mails, we include the heaviest month of the year, namely, the month of March. We weigh for one hundred and five days. I do not think it is fair to the system or fair to the Government that the mails should be weighed with the center of the weighing period containing the heaviest month of the year. I think that the weighing should be done in this way: That, first, this country should have a complete year's weighing to determine just where the weights are heavy and just where the weights are light, and to find from that year's weighing an average week which would fairly represent the average weight for the whole year, and then, cutting out the expense of weighing for a great number of days, take some one week in the year that would give a fair average for the whole year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think a week would be more representative than a period of one hundred and five days?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly; because to-day the gentleman is standing for a system which weighs the mails for an average for a year, when there is no man on earth who knows what the weights of mail for a whole year are.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman knows, from the testimony of the post-office officials before the committee, that according to their position the one hundred and five days represent the best average period of any in the year.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Post-Office Department, in my opinion, is guessing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman contend that one hundred and five days in the fall of the year, in the heavy months, would represent a fair average?

Mr. MURDOCK. I contend that the present weighing time does not produce a fair average.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman take one hundred and five days during the summer as a fair average?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows I would do nothing of the kind. I do say that the gentleman from Wisconsin does not know that the period in which we are now weighing is a fair period for finding the average daily weight of the mail for a year, and I do believe that this country should determine, first of all, what the weights of mail are for a year—that is, when they are heavy and when they are light—and then take the least possible number of days, for the sake of economy, and determine what is a fair average period, whether it be in the fall or whether it be in the spring.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would there not be graver abuses against the Post-Office Department through the padding of the mails during the short period of a week than during the whole course of one hundred and five days? Does not the gentleman know that the Railway Mail Service has traveling superintendents on the road during the weighing season to detect any possible padding of the mails, which they could not detect if it was limited to merely a week?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I want to say as far as the padding is concerned——

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not in favor of such a limited period of weighing.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not care whether the gentleman is or not; I think that would be a fair way.

[The time of Mr. MURDOCK having again expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended five minutes.]

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WANGER. May not the average mail carried in a week vary from year to year in different parts of the country?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is very true, and it might be better to take a longer period than a week, but until you do have a whole year's weighing you are not going to be able to get a correct average. It is true from year to year the weight may differ, but I do not think it would differ as much as gentlemen would imagine.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not understand him to mean to intimate that the rise and fall in the amount of postage received is much of an indication of the rise and fall of the weight of the mail.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is virtually the only indication we have except by actual physical observation.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Is not the rise and fall of the receipts for postage an indication of the rise and fall of first-class mail matter, whereas the second-class mail matter is more stationary?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I do not know about that; third-class matter would come in. The reason for the heavy mail in March, I understand, is because of the mailing of the catalogues, which go out under third-class rates.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it not one of the requirements of the railway companies that they must deliver the mail at the post-office and then go and get it and put it on the train?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman means where the post-office is within 80 rods of the station. That is not a law; it is a regulation.

Mr. MURPHY. But that is one of the requirements that the railroads have to comply with.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it not also true that in a very large number of cases, perhaps in nearly 100 per cent of these cases, this mail is handled by the station agents without any additional expense to the company?

Mr. MURDOCK. I can not say that; I suppose it is an additional expense to the company; the railroads claim that it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am satisfied that it is not.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee has seen from the very brief discussion on this question that it is an extremely complicated one, and I think the gentleman from Kansas will agree with me in that.

Mr. MURDOCK. I certainly do. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I want to say that in a matter of this kind there ought to be further investigation. The whole subject should be gone over again, and I have no doubt in the course of years it will be gone over and over again. I think in this matter of the railway-mail pay we ought first to get the method down to the simplest way of computation, that we ought to determine, as a Government, a fair weighing period to get an average daily weight.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the gentleman a question. If we were going to do an absolutely fair thing by the corporations and by the Government, we would take some period when the mail weighed a fair average for the year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. The mails increase about 7 per cent a year, do they not, and have for the past ten years? In other words, the weight of the mail four years from now will be 25 per cent greater than now, and perhaps 30 per cent. Now, take a period—and this should be called to the attention of the committee—take a period of one hundred and five days in the spring, even admitting that that is not a fair average period for the year, will not the gentleman from Kansas admit that the railways would carry during the following three years more mail than they were paid for for the year of the weighing? In other words, they are carrying the next year an increase of 7 per cent, and the next year an increase of 14 per cent, and a third year an increase of 21 or 22 per cent, as the case might be.

Mr. MURDOCK. The "gentleman from Kansas" of course knows that the weight of the mail in this country is naturally increasing, and I think in different sections about 7 per cent annually. The "gentleman from Kansas" also knows that this rate was first made in 1873 on a basis of quadrennial weighings which the railroads knew and accepted.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, one more question. I would like to ask the gentleman, because he has given a good deal of consideration to this subject, does he think, on the whole, that the railroads are being paid materially more for the transportation of the mails than the service is worth? I asked that question, admitting that in my judgment this question needs further adjustment and further investigation, but with that in view I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it does?

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman mean more than they should receive?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I believe that the present law should be changed so that there should be a graduated pay above the 5,000-pound average daily weight limit at lesser grades than jumps of 43,000 pounds.

Mr. WEEKS. I agree to that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman agrees to that; and if that graduated scale should be changed, it should be changed into grades until it covered those routes in the country which carry the largest average daily weight.

Mr. WEEKS. Has the gentleman information which makes him conclude that railroads are being paid materially more than they should be for the service which they are performing? I ask that question because the House and the country are interested.

Mr. MURDOCK. It depends on the railroads. As to those railroads which have larger average daily weight, I should say yes.

Mr. WEEKS. How about what are known as the short-line railroads?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would say in regard to the Long Island Railroad, of Long Island, New York, absolutely no.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I do not know that there are many members of the committee who have been on the committee longer than has the gentleman from Kansas, and I have not heard any of them indicate that he has dug into this question of railway transportation as much as the gentleman has. I would like very much for my information, and I think other gentleman would appreciate it also——

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say that I do not claim to be an expert on the matter of railway-mail pay.

Mr. SMITH of California. But I claim that the gentleman is. Let me make the claim.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not make the claim. I have taken up just certain features of this proposition and tried to get at some concrete facts in regard to it.

Mr. SMITH of California. The only way we can measure out this problem to the people, I think, at the present time is on general results. Therefore, I would like to press the gentleman for an answer to the question propounded by the chairman of the committee. Does the gentleman think the entire mail pay to the railroads is materially in excess of the service we receive from the railroads, take the whole country over? Of course one can pick out exceptions here and there both ways.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will try and answer the gentleman just as he would like to have me.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think the gentleman can answer that yes or no and then explain.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then explain to us in what particular or to what extent it is excessive.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think that would take me two hours and a half.

Mr. SMITH of California. Oh, boil it down.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will boil it down to two minutes and a half.

Mr. SMITH of California. That is better.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would first find out whether we had a fair way of getting the average daily weight. I think the present method is faulty. I would lower the rates by changing the grades of pay above the average daily weights of 5,000 pounds. I would do those two things first. I would further investigate this proposition as a whole; but above all, as the gentleman knows, I would establish, so far as the transportation of mail matter between towns is concerned, absolutely a government monopoly. I would take over the mails to the Government.

Mr. SMITH of California. That is wandering off to something else.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am not wandering off to something else. I will say to the gentleman, and I want to say it enters vitally into this proposition, that, as a matter of fact, in all our short, heavy routes we get a lower rate by reason of our increased tonnage, and we are all the time lowering our tonnage on short hauls by surrendering the matter that belongs to us to the haul of the express company.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from California having established the fact that the gentleman from Kansas is an expert——

Mr. MURDOCK. I deny it.

Mr. SMITH of California. Well, I will give my word on that.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas if he does not agree with me that Congress has not been unmindful of this great question; that it has not been negligent of this question, but that it has from time to time, especially in the last few years, considered it and made distinct reforms; and that the department is now asking a series of questions which, when they are submitted to Congress, may form a basis for an adjustment along the lines which are criticised by the gentleman himself and by others?

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, that is a pretty long question, but I will answer it by saying "yes." I think that Congress has been diligent in this matter, but I do think that Congress was derelict when it refused three years ago to change a self-evident error.

Mr. SMITH of California. The gentleman refers to the divisor?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. On the other hand, do not you believe that 7 is as fair as 6?

Mr. MURDOCK. Seven is a fair divisor. Six is absolutely indefensible as a divisor.

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not know that either one can be justified, because the Sunday mail is not as heavy as the other days. Now, I would like to come to this: I have established the gentleman's reputation as an expert here——

Mr. MURDOCK. For which I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of California. We are appropriating in this bill approximately $49,000,000 for railroad pay. How much less than that should it be?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have not made the computation on my proposals. I will never be able to make my computation completely until this country determines what is a fair weighing period.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then, with your present information, you are not prepared to assert that it should be any less?

Mr. MURDOCK. As to the matter of the average daily weight, I am prepared to assert that we ought to make a further reduction above the 5,000-pound average daily weight limit.

I did not want to talk this long. I have never made any particular study of railway-mail pay. I have been drawn into it at times by reason of discussion. I want to say, further, before I close, that some day Congress ought to have, and is going to have, the figures to work on in this matter of railway-mail pay. Now, if the gentleman will permit, I will get a little more time and answer at greater length. We have always had these disputes and always will until the day comes when we will have a controlling decision.

The Government and the railroads do not enter into a contract so far as carrying the mails is concerned, if I am correctly informed. The railroads prepare a distance circular, a printed circular which shows the distances between towns upon their lines. Some one in authority signs that circular, and it is sent down here to the department, and the department, after verification of that circular, pays the railroad. The lawyers tell me that it is not a contract. Some day some railroad in this country—and there are a good many of them of this mind—will come to the conclusion that it has not been getting enough money for the carriage of the mails. In other words——

Mr. FASSETT. Is not that the general attitude now?

Mr. MURDOCK. In other words, that it is carrying the mails at a rate that is confiscatory, and that railroad meaning business and grounded in its conviction, will refuse to sign this distance circular.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not that being done at present?

Mr. MURDOCK. I could not state; but if it is ever done, that railroad will soon go into court, and the courts of this country will finally give us a figure from which we can work so far as rates are concerned. And I want to say to the gentleman from California and to others that even after we have a rate from which to work as a norm, this Government ought to take steps to find out what is a fair period for weighing the mails to determine what the average daily weight should be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. PARSONS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARSONS. I understood the gentleman to say the Long Island Railroad was not overpaid?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think not.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it underpaid?

Mr. MURDOCK. I should say yes, under our system, and as compared with other railroads.

Mr. PARSONS. How then would you adjust the pay that it should receive as compared with the pay that a road like the New York Central should receive? What are the different elements?

Mr. MURDOCK. It is beyond me, I will say to the gentleman from New York, to adjust the pay of the Long Island Railroad, which is an exceptional case.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," line 18, page 19, insert the following:
"Provided, That no part of this amount shall be paid to any railway company which does not furnish all mail cars sound in material and structure, and for the purpose of enforcing this provision the Postmaster-General is authorized to have such inspection of cars made as may be sufficient to determine their condition under regulations made by him."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. GARRETT. I am willing to have the Chair pass on the point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, that is the practice of the department now, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. The amendment is clearly legislation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARRETT. It is. It is a limitation on the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT. I think it is a limitation on the appropriation, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], if he cares to say anything on the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I have not by me now the book of precedents, but it seems very clear to me it is a limitation, but no more limitation on the appropriation than is frequently the practice in this House. It does not make a permanent law. It is a limitation just on this specific appropriation. It does not make permanent law.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the amendment is an affirmative, substantive proposition, which would change existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. May I ask a question or two about this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 18, after the word "dollars," insert:
"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid any railroad which requires any telegraph or telephone operator who handles orders pertaining to or affecting the movements of trains to handle the mail between stations and post-offices."

Mr. WEEKS. I make a point of order against that.

Mr. MURPHY. I ask the gentleman to make it and state what it is.

Mr. WEEKS. That is a limitation on the functions of the executive officers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment would require a work now done by the Post-Office Department which it is not authorized to perform at all. It would require the Post-Office Department to ascertain in reference to the method of conducting the business by the railroad companies, which the department is now not authorized to ascertain, and it seems to me contains a positive requirement of the department to do something not merely which it is not now required to do, but which it is not now authorized to do; and while it is in the form of a limitation, this money shall not be appropriated unless something is done, and that "unless" is to do something positive which the department is neither required nor authorized now to do.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is admitted that this is a limitation upon an appropriation, and is clearly in order.

Mr. MANN. It is not admitted.

Mr. MURPHY. I asked the question, as the Chair remembers, during the debate on a previous amendment here, if it was not a requirement on the part of the department for the railroads to handle the mail between the post-offices and the stations, and the answer was in the affirmative. That is where the distance was within 80 rods. And, of course, this amendment would not affect anything that was beyond 80 rods, because the Government would handle it then.

Mr. WEEKS. May I call to the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] that that is a regulation of the department and not a law?

Mr. MURPHY. Then, sir, it would be in order if it is a regulation, because it would not change any existing law. It would be in order because it is not legislation.

This amendment clearly provides where a railroad company requires one of this class of employees, who ought to be at his post of duty, many accidents having occurred because they were not, to handle the mail between station and post-office, shall not receive any part of this appropriation. Now, as stated, the railroad is required to handle the mail between post-offices and stations. We have a right to say here that they shall not require certain employees to thus handle the mail if they get any of this money that we propose to appropriate. That is all we are attempting to do. We do not say that they shall not handle the mail between stations or between stations and post-offices; but we do say that a railroad requiring a certain class of employees to do this work shall not receive any part of this money for the same if it is handled by a telegraph or telephone operator who handles orders pertaining to or affecting train movements.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are any number of decisions which will sustain this amendment. For instance, the sundry civil bill every year carries a provision "that no part of the appropriation made for a soldiers' home shall be available for any soldiers' home that contains a canteen." If the reasoning of the gentleman from Illinois were sound, the mere fact that somebody would be compelled to ascertain whether canteens were maintained in one of the soldiers' homes would be sufficient to make the amendment obnoxious to the rule. I called the attention of the Chair yesterday to an amendment which was held in order, which is clearly in line with this amendment. It provided:

That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended unless the programme for the conference contain a provision for a discussion of reciprocal trade relations between the countries participating in the conference.

That amendment necessitated investigation and inquiry by the Department of State as to whether that conference had in its programme a discussion of the matter mentioned in that particular amendment; and the Chair held that that amendment was in order. If the gentleman offered an amendment that no railroad company which employed red-headed men shall receive any part of the money for transporting the mails, that amendment would be in order. It would be a limitation upon the appropriation within the rule. We can withhold appropriations from any company which does not meet certain requirements. This clearly comes within the well-settled rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with my distinguished friend from New York. The case he cites has no relevancy to this case at all. Here is a proposition, not that we will make an appropriation, not that it shall not be effective if the Post-Office Department does or does not maintain canteens, but a provision that no part of this appropriation shall be paid to a railroad company, when—if it permits a telegraph operator connected with the movement of trains to carry the mail from the post-office to the station. Here we have a positive requirement of the Post-Office Department to ascertain the facts whether this telegraph operator is employed in connection with the movement of trains.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Members have frequently offered amendments which have been held in order prohibiting the payment of any part of an appropriation to corporations that were engaged in restraint of trade and that required the ascertainment of whether or not they were trusts.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Here it is simply a limitation that makes it necessary to ascertain whether the railroad is requiring certain things of certain employees.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is a different proposition entirely.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Take the case of the canteen at the National Soldiers' Home; the money is appropriated, and the money can not be expended in any soldiers' home where a canteen is maintained.

Mr. MANN. True enough.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Somebody must ascertain.

Mr. MANN. Why, the manager of the soldiers' home knows whether he is maintaining a canteen or not. They can not have a canteen without his direction. Here is a proposition entirely apart from the question of what a government official does, and what a government official knows, and what comes within the purview of his work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On the question of the purchase of powder from a trust, the Navy Department was compelled to ascertain whether the competitor was in fact a trust or part of a combination understood as a trust. That was entirely outside of the department, and required some investigation to ascertain the facts.

Mr. MURPHY. Would not the postmasters of these various towns at each of such stations know whether the railroad company was requiring this man to carry the mail as easily as any manager of a soldiers' home would know about whether there was a canteen established?

Mr. MANN. The Auditor for the Post-Office would not know; the Post-Office Department would not hear, nor would the postmaster know anything about it.

Mr. MURPHY. Can not they inquire?

Mr. MANN. He might have heard a rumor, but he could not know, because he does not know what the telegraph operator may be doing in reference to the movement of trains. The practical effect of an amendment of this sort would be this: We now have a law under which the department makes a regulation requiring the railroads to carry the mails for a distance of 80 rods between the stations and the post-office. That regulation is within the power of the Post-Office Department. We make contracts with the railroad companies under that regulation, and under which contract they are obliged to carry the mails that distance. If we interfere with that proposition, and say that they shall not be permitted to use the telephone or telegraph operators at some place connected with the movement of trains, perhaps the station agent will be the only one at the station, we absolve the railroad companies from the contract, and take every limitation from the railroad on an appropriation bill.

The result will be if this goes into effect that the mails at these points will not be carried at all. This will be a positive direction by Congress that the only person employed by the railroad company who could carry the mails shall not carry them, and that will absolve the railroad company from carrying the mails in that way, and is a change of law.

Mr. MURPHY. Is there anything in the contract with the railroad company for carrying the mail that says a telegraph or telephone operator shall carry it or shall not carry it?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I assume there is not. I have not examined the contract.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The last part of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois was to the merits of this qeustion, and not on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; the gentleman is mistaken. It was to the effect that under a limitation we were seeking not only a change of law, but to break a contract authorized by law, which itself would be a change of law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You always have the right to abrogate these contracts. Now, I want to ask you another question: How do you come to the conclusion that the postmaster can not find out, without putting himself to any considerable amount of trouble, whether these men are doing the things that this amendment undertakes to prevent?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had had the honor—and I wish he had—of serving on the committee of which I am chairman, and had heard the testimony in reference to telegraph and telephone operators, he would have discovered before this that it was a very difficult thing even for the railroad companies themselves to ascertain whether or not a telegraph or telephone operator was engaged in the movement of trains. And yet the gentleman assumes that the postmaster, entirely apart from the railroad company, can ascertain that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The trouble in that case was that you were listening to the railroad companies.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21419) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6661. An act in aid of navigation of the Cape Fear River at and below the city of Wilmington, Del.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13410. An act to modify the One hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War and to repeal the One hundred and twenty-third Article of War;

H. R. 18681. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5697. An act to authorize the change of name of the steamers A. B. Wolvin and Cambria, owned by the Port Huron and Duluth Steamship Company; and

S. 4639. An act concerning tonnage duties on vessels entering otherwise than by sea.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 18681. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. FISH, for three days, on account of important business.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, and the same were referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors:

A bill (H. R. 21591) for the construction of a bridge across the Red River at Puckett, Clark County, Ky.

LEAVE TO INTRODUCE BILLS, ETC.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SHEFFIELD was given leave, on behalf of his colleague [Mr. CAPRON], to submit for introduction and reference to committees bills, petitions, resolutions, and memorials.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DE ARMOND.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that Saturday, April 9, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for eulogies on the late Judge DE ARMOND.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that Saturday, April 9, after 2 o'clock, be set apart for eulogies upon the late Representative DE ARMOND. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

By Mr. WANGER: Petition of Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, to have the port-to-port business of water carriers unaffected by provisions of Senate bill 5106 and House bill 17536—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Friends' Temperance Association, of Philadelphia, Pa., for the McCumber-Tirrell bill and the Owen-Hamilton bill, relating to sale of intoxicants in government buildings and upon and adjacent to Indian reservations—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 5, 1910.

(Continuation of legislative day of Thursday, March 3, 1910.)

The Senate reassembled at 11.45 o'clock a. m.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. KEAN. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present. This is too important an amendment to be passed over here in a mere beggarly array of empty benches. Therefore I ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call will show whether a quorum is present. The Secretary will proceed with the calling of the roll.

Mr. CLAY. May I ask what we are voting on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are voting on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. CLAY. Were the yeas and nays ordered on the amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. KEAN (when the name of Mr. BRIGGS was called). I understand that my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. BURTON (when his name was called). Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that this is a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BURTON. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I have a special pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on the bill and amendments. If he were present I should vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER]. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). On this amendment and all other amendments and on the final vote on the bill I am paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). On the pending amendment I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate by sickness. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. Upon all amendments to the bill and upon the final passage of the bill I am specially paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, I understand he would vote "nay," and if he were present and I were free to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FLINT. I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE. I am paired on the bill with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CLAY. When my name was called I announced my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I have been requested to announce that if the senior Senator from Pennsylvania were present, he would vote in favor of the passage of the bill and all committee amendments, including the Smoot amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ELKINS] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. I believe he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BURROWS. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] is absent from the Chamber on account of sickness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. FOSTER. My colleague [Mr. MCENERY] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. He requested me to state that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Beveridge	Clapp	Dolliver	Shively

Culberson	Hughes	Purcell

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. BORAH. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Utah. It is to add the following proviso——

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me a moment to call attention to a matter of a clerical error. I wish to call attention to it that it may be considered in connection with the Senator's amendment. In the second line the word "Government" is inadvertently used instead of "United States." It should be "United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the proposed amendment, after the words "United States," the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of said funds shall, in any event, be invested in bonds or other securities bearing less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this proposed amendment, as I understand it, fixes the minimum rate of interest to be borne by securities, the subject of investment, at the same standard fixed as the minimum for the deposits in the banks.

Mr. BORAH. At the same rate?

Mr. CARTER. I see no reason why the same rule should not apply to both.

Mr. BORAH. I desire a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rose to ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of said funds shall, in any event, be invested in bonds or other securities bearing less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he would have any objection to modifying the amendment so as to say "yielding," rather than "bearing."

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not want to consent to that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE and Mr. FRYE. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I again announce that upon this amendment I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present. If he were present and I were free to vote, I should vote "nay," upon the ground that I am opposed to any investment in bonds.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but I transfer it for the day to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER]. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair on this question with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

The roll was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to announce the absence on account of sickness of my colleague [Mr. TILLMAN]. He has a standing pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And I have transferred my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] on all questions growing out of the bill. I shall make no further announcement during the day.

Mr. FLINT. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR. My colleague [Mr. FRAZIER] is paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Beveridge	Cullom	Guggenheim	Scott
Borah	Cummins	Hughes	Shively
Bradley	Curtis	Johnston	Simmons

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I voted negatively on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], for this reason: It does not seem to me that the United States could afford, having received money of its citizens on deposit, to use that fund to take up its indebtedness and have nothing to pay the depositor when he called for his deposit. How can you pay the depositor if the President is authorized to invest the deposit in bonds, at any rate of interest? What is there left in the Treasury? There is probably a working balance to-day, taking it out of the juggling of bookkeeping, of about $22,000,000. There is no decided indication that we are going to have such a redundant Treasury at any time that if the United States shall invest these deposits when they shall come in into bonds it can meet the demand of the depositors for cash, and to say that the depositors shall stand outside, out of reach, is putting the United States in the attitude of an embezzler, for it occupies a fiduciary position toward the depositor. That is as to my reason for my vote.

Further, Mr. President, I do not see that there is anything but an obvious device in the amendment of the Senator from Utah to give color of constitutionality to a measure which the President of the United States, after careful consideration, has declared to be lacking in that quality. He is concurred in in that opinion by the ablest lawyers, probably, in the Senate, on both sides of the Chamber. The question is, when there is no constitutionality to do the thing proposed, whether one of the faraway purposes, not immediate objects, can be used to give constitutionality to the act itself.

There is certainly no qualification of utility in the proposition of the Senator from Utah, because the United States does not need any such legislation to enable it to provide for an emergency of war or an exigency of peace. In time of war the Congress has always been ready to use all the machinery in its power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, excises, duties, and so forth. It does not hesitate to lay its sovereign hand not only upon everything that is sold and bought in the market, but directly upon the property of the people. It can impress for the use of its soldiers the very provisions in your storeroom for your family. It can take your horse and your wagon, and can put its hand upon you, if you are of the right age, and can compel you to take your musket and do the fighting. It has the supreme command under the Constitution, not saying a word about martial law, of impressing every man and all his property, if necessary, for the common defense. That is constitutional and legitimate, and it would be used in a case where the Government must preserve its life. It is a time when, as Alexander Hamilton said, all parts and provisions of the Constitution go into shreds; in the emergency of war—of public stress, I believe he said, certainly in time of war.

This is utterly useless legislation. It can not make the Government any more ready or more powerful to exercise its constitutional authority to do what may be necessary to supply the sinews of war.

What may be covered up under the other exigencies which are provided for in the amendment we do not know, but we do know that the Congress of the United States should never delegate its power to the Executive to lay taxes upon the people, and a diversion of the tax fund to put it into bonds can only be justified in any event by some supreme necessity of the state. There has never been a time when Congress was not willing to supply anything that was lacking to prosecute war or to survive any civil peril.

We have seen bonds issued to build the Panama Canal, and for no other purpose, issued at a rate that was a tax upon the people, to be loaned to the national banks for the purpose of preventing a panic, for a merely commercial use. This has been justified, because it was necessary to prevent a panic. It was of doubtful constitutionality in some minds and utterly so in others. We are committing ourselves by this kind of an amendment to loose legislation, without one particle of utility, without one particle of necessity, and it is not intended to serve any useful purpose, I will say, without any disrespect whatever to the distinguished Senator who has offered it, but to give a color of constitutionality to the bill itself.

This bill has not only been pronounced unconstitutional by the President of the United States, but this Chamber has never heard, since I have been here at least, any finer argument than was submitted by the honorable senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] and that profound and lucid exposition of the constitutional question by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. It has the weight of the great legal Senator from the State of New York [Mr. ROOT]. It has been debated on both sides. I do not believe there is in this Chamber to-day any very material difference of opinion as to the constitutionality of this bill as it stood in its original text.

These devices do not clear away that difficulty. It is impossible to say that the United States Government has a right to establish these postal savings banks to encourage thrift and economy, and to make it constitutional, which it lacks, at some time in the future not named, for some exigency not foreseen, for some purpose which can not yet be apprehended, it can be used for a purpose that will probably make it constitutional.

Mr. President, you can not confer any quality of constitutionality upon this act by such a makeshift of a device as that. It does not stand the test of reason; it does not commend itself to the common sense. If this amendment is adopted it has no more weight nor influence to give the act constitutionality than it had before. But it may satisfy some gentlemen who are anxious to vote for a bill which they in reality condemn. Of course, every Senator votes exactly as he pleases, to suit his own opinions, and very often against his opinions, to suit the demands of his constituents. I do not wish any Senator to quarrel with his constituents on either good or bad grounds. He is here in some sense as their representative, not, however, in a primary sense. He is here to check the hasty deliberations of another body that comes directly from the people. He is here representing not a constituency of people, but States, sovereign in their sphere, who have taken care to provide for their equality as such in this Chamber.

Mr. President, I suppose this bill will pass, and those who are in the majority of course will take both the credit and responsibility; but I hope that those who represent the Democracy in this Chamber, at least those who represent Democratic States, will see to it that they have a sufficient reason to give their constituents for their action when they vote for a measure like this.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, upon reflection I think the words "interest at" should be inserted in my amendment to the amendment, in order to make no doubt as to the meaning of it. I ask unanimous consent that the words "interest at" be included in the amendment after the word "bearing."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KEAN. What is the request?

The SECRETARY. After the word "bearing" to insert the words "interest at."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the change in the amendment? If not, it is so ordered.

The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it be read as it now stands before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. In section 8 of the bill, on page 7, line 22, after the words "United States," strike out all of the bill down to and including the words "per annum," on line 13, page 8, and insert:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States: Provided further, That no part of said funds shall, in any event, be invested in bonds or other securities bearing interest at less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, before the question is put, I merely want to suggest the position in which it leaves this measure, without doing more. It will be recognized that it eliminates the 2 per cent bonds from the operation of the act, and it not only eliminates the redemption or the purchase of the 2 per cent bonds, but in case of war, which is the contingency provided for in the bill, it would prevent us from using this money through the medium of the issue or purchase of any bonds at a rate less than two and a quarter. We could not fight a war on a 2 per cent basis with this amendment adopted. It makes the war a little more expensive.

Mr. BORAH. That is upon the theory that we could not conduct a war without the funds which are found in the postal savings banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have now been amending the bill upon the theory that we are going to use that fund.

Mr. BORAH. In time of war.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, before this amendment is voted upon I should like to make a few remarks.

The Senator from Montana has inferentially labeled as opponents of the establishment of postal savings banks all the members of the Senate who voted for what is termed the "Cummins amendment." I for one object to being thus classified as an opponent of postal savings banks, because I favored the adoption of the Cummins amendment and would have voted for it but for the fact I was unavoidably absent at the time of the vote, though my presence would not have changed the result.

For many years I have been an ardent advocate of the establishment of postal savings depositaries. During my three years' service in this body I have had the honor to serve as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and have at all times earnestly endeavored to secure early action in favor of legislation of this character. In the last Congress I was a member of the subcommittee to which was delegated the duty of preparing a composite postal savings-bank bill from the various bills on that subject introduced in the Senate.

The senior Senator from Montana served as chairman of that subcommittee. The subcommittee and the full committee agreed upon a bill and reported it to the Senate. No such provisions as set forth in the Smoot amendment were contained in that bill.

RESTORE HIDDEN MONEY TO CIRCULATION.

The arguments presenting themselves to my mind in favor of postal savings depositaries are: First, the providing of media for restoration to circulation of what I will term frightened and hidden money; second, the establishment of an additional incentive to habits of thrift among our people; third, to give greater convenience for safe-keeping of savings of the people in sparsely settled portions of our country where banking facilities do not now exist.

Assuming the bill as equally constitutional as reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, or as sought to be amended by the Smoot amendment, I desire to set forth my views as to the movements of the money after deposited by the people. Such movement would ultimately be the same under any of the provisions above referred to unless the President should order a withdrawal under the exigency clause provided in the Smoot amendment.

The postal depositaries would first act as concentrators, or collectors, on account of the absolute confidence of the people in the integrity and solvency of the Government. In time several hundred millions of dollars not now doing duty as tools in our governmental and business life would be vitalized and restored to full efficiency and service. When thus collected, the law of movement of money would govern, namely, it would seek the place or places where it would earn the greatest increment. Thus the money so deposited by the people in the local postal depositaries and borrowed by the banks in the neighborhood under the provisions of the bill or regulations of the board of trustees would, in time, flow through these banks to the money centers during the periods when the banks receiving said deposits could earn more on such money in the moneyed centers than they could in their own localities.

THRIFT ENCOURAGED.

Now I come to the thrift feature, which strongly appeals to my mind. I believe that the individual who through the establishment of these depositaries ultimately saves $500, which is the maximum amount that can be deposited under this bill, will acquire by so doing a habit of thrift. With this habit thus acquired, the next evolution of that individual is necessarily a desire for increased returns on the money he has saved. His chief desire will be the safety of the principal, and this will be assured by the government guaranty; but the opportunity to secure a 3½ or 4 per cent return offered by savings banks, or possibly 6 per cent, as received by some of his neighbors on mortgages, will also appeal to his mind, and the mental contest will continue as between the governmental guaranty of safety of the principal and the desire for all possible returns on his money.

In the end, Mr. President, the wish to make capital earn as much as possible for its owner will, in most cases, overcome the original dominating idea of safety of principal. If right in my reasoning, the depositor will then withdraw his money, or a part of it, from the postal depositary where he is receiving only 2 per cent per annum and redeposit it in a bank where he receives a higher rate of interest, or loan it to individual borrowers at a still greater profit, or invest it in securities returning even a higher rate of interest, or possibly start a business, acquire a home, or use his money in the development of new industries. Thus the money returns to activity in the community in which it was originally deposited. Hence, the two strong features appealing to my mind and causing me to favor the establishment of postal depositaries, namely, the providing of a medium for frightened and hidden money through which channel its efficiency would be increased, and making many converts to the virtue of thrift, would be established.

SMOOT AMENDMENT A MENACE.

While favoring the establishment of postal depositaries for the reasons I have given, yet, Mr. President, I am strongly opposed to the adoption of what is known as the "Smoot amendment." Any student of our Government must realize the steadily increasing power of the President of the United States, due, in part, to the centralization incident to the evolution of both government and business and, possibly, in part to the tendency of humanity to shift responsibility. To my mind, Mr. President, the increasing power of the administrative branch of the Government must bring about a corresponding diminution of the power of the legislative branch and in its ultimate evolution establish in effect a monarchical form of government.

In what is known as the "Smoot amendment" it is provided that when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of directors may withdraw all or any part of the postal savings funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

The adoption of this amendment would delegate to an individual the right to determine what constitutes an "exigency" which, because of the language of the amendment, becomes a menace to the credit of the United States. This is a power, Mr. President, that I am unwilling to assist in degelating to any one man. To my mind, the existence of such a power would be a menace to all the property and business of this country, for if, in the future, a President should be elected who, in his best judgment, should decide that an exigency did exist and should call for these funds, a panic would be precipitated the like of which the history of this or any other country has never known. Sentiment often temporarily controls and always affects values.

EXERCISE OF POWER WOULD CREATE PANIC.

Suppose in the future a President, either under error of judgment or under a mental aberration, should make a call for the hundreds of millions, which we, the advocates of the establishment of postal depositaries, believe will, in the course of a few years, be intrusted to the care of the Government, such action on his part would, in my opinion, immediately cause a shrinkage in the market value of securities, paralyze business, and result in the loss of billions of dollars and the ruin of a large portion of the great class of commercial debtors. In addition to this, during the period necessary for restoration of confidence, there would be a direct loss to the country of billions of dollars in lost efficiency of brains, muscle, and money during the period of stagnation incident to the panic and the time necessary for recovery from its effects. I would infinitely rather give my vote for a provision that those moneys received from the people, deposited in the postal depositaries, should be sent direct to Washington to be invested in the bonds of the United States than to delegate to any individual, no matter who he might be, the right of determination as to when an exigency other than war exists.

Mr. President, it appeals to my mind as illogical that the power proposed to be conferred by the Smoot amendment would in time of emergency save the credit of our Government even if a thousand millions of money were deposited by the people in the postal depositaries and the President had the right to order its withdrawal and investment in securities of the United States. Such action on the part of the President, whether an exigency existed or not, would necessarily result in the withdrawal by the depositors of their funds, a panic would be precipitated instead of avoided, and the Government would be compelled to sell bonds.

Does any Senator here pretend to say that the credit of our Government, in time of war or peace, would be affected or saved by the right of any man to exercise this power, assuming that the power carried with it control of a thousand millions of dollars?

We have in this country, I believe, $140,000,000,000 worth of property. We have enormous undeveloped resources, a virile people, and, with honest, intelligent legislation, I believe that within fifty years from now our wealth will exceed $300,000,000,000. Our credit at home and abroad rests primarily on our wealth, resources, and the integrity of our people.

PANICS NOT DUE TO LACK OF CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT.

Yesterday the junior Senator from New York very graphically depicted the horrors of a panic and predicted others would come. None of the panics referred to by the Senator were occasioned by any lack of confidence in the ability or intentions of our Government to meet all its financial obligations. Cupidity and overspeculation are the basic causes of panics in a marvelously rich country like ours. Under normal conditions there will be no panics in this country if capital is properly regulated, publicity provided, and accountability secured, thus preventing misuse of the corporation method of conducting business.

Mr. President, I desire to reiterate that I deem the exigency clause in the Smoot amendment a menace to, rather than a possible protection of our national credit—an unnecessary delegation of power to an individual when error of judgment in its exercise might precipitate infinite suffering, loss, and unhappiness upon our people, and I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as amended.

Mr. OWEN. I offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered by Mr. SMOOT it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, the immediate repayment of depositors of the postal savings banks requires it he may authorize the issuance of temporary certificates of indebtedness of the Treasury, bearing 3 per cent interest, to the extent required to meet such contingency.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the main argument of a practical character in favor of investing postal savings in the bonds of the United States is that those bonds may be promptly sold in case of need to furnish money with which to pay the depositors on demand. A 3 per cent temporary certificate will meet that contingency as well as a bond of the United States, because if it should ever prove to be true that the demand of the postal savings depositors should be made upon the Government in times of panic, these temporary certificates will be sufficient to provide currency with which to meet that demand; and, therefore, there is no reason whatever for withdrawing this money from the localities where it is deposited.

I enter my emphatic protest against the proposal that it is necessary to withdraw this money from the different States and concentrate it in New York for the benefit of the holders and owners of the bonds of the Government by the purchase of such bonds because it is not necessary. We know perfectly well—and the history of this country has proven it—that in times of panic in the past the people of the United States who have been afraid of the banks have made haste to go to the post-offices and buy money orders without interest and without invitation for the purpose of obtaining the greater security the Government affords.

It was a very alarming picture drawn by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that in times of panic the 22,000 banks of the United States, with $1,500,000,000 of resources, would all suspend; that the United States would be called on suddenly to pay $500,000,000 of postal-savings deposits, and that the United States would be bankrupt and unable to meet this demand. The substitute which I offer will meet that contingency, if it should ever arise; but it never would arise and never could arise, because the people of the United States will never lack confidence in the stability of this Government or make such a demand in times of financial panic. On the contrary, the Government, having the right to impose and the ability easily to collect taxes of a thousand million dollars a year, would have a stability so great that it would actually attract and not repel deposits in times of panic, instead of losing the deposits at such a time or being required to make immediate payment.

But, more than that, I call the attention of the Senate to this, that if the contention of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] be true that the banks would all suspend and the people would have no confidence in the Government's promises to pay, of what avail would be his proposal, of what avail would be the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], because both plans propose the sale of bonds at a time when the banks have no money and when the promises of the United States to pay have no credit?

The Senator from New York proved too much. He proved that his own amendment would be entirely valueless and would not furnish the cash he alleges we should in such a contingency require. I have no fear of the stability of the United States. I have no fear of the credit of the United States. It has not only the ability to raise a thousand million dollars per annum, but it has in effect all the property and productive power of the people of the United States behind it, with property so vast and a people so industrious, provident, and stable that the credit of the Government can never lose the confidence of the citizenship of this Republic.

I offer, therefore, this proposal, because I do not believe that the amendment of the Senator from Utah is necessary to make this bill constitutional. It seems to be believed by various gentlemen that this bill is not constitutional unless there be added to it the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah. The effect of that amendment is to bring the postal savings-bank bill within the saving grace of the constitutional power of Congress to borrow money. The bill is already inside the shelter of that clause of the Constitution. Congress has the power "to borrow money" under the Constitution, and the exercise of that power is proposed by the bill without the need of the Senator's amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Utah is a proposal that these funds may be invested in the bonds of the United States, and therefore it is learnedly contended that this bill in such a contingency will provide for the borrowing of money and be within the constitutional power of Congress.

I agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that that plea is a subterfuge; but I go further, and call the attention of the Senate to the fact that every postal savings-bank deposit is itself a loan by the depositor to the United States and a sum borrowed by the United States from the depositor; and if the United States has a right to borrow money through its bonds at 2 per cent or at 3 per cent or at 4 per cent, it has a right to borrow money at 2 per cent from the individual depositor in the postal savings system, and there is no difference of principle whatever. If the act of borrowing in the second instance on bonds makes the bill constitutional, the act of borrowing from the citizen in the first instance makes it constitutional, and the argument of the Senator from Utah that his amendment is necessary to make the bill constitutional has no persuasive force.

Undoubtedly under section 8 of the Constitution Congress has the right to borrow money upon the credit of the United States. Language can be made no plainer. Will you say that because this money is not to be used for certain specified expenses of the Government that therefore it does not exist as a constitutional power?

Mr. President, I agree that the first clause of section 8 of the Constitution, authorizing Congress to raise taxes to promote the general welfare, is merely a qualification on the purpose of raising taxes and would justify any law merely because intended to promote the general welfare; but here is a proviso most explicit that Congress has the power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." The purposes of this Constitution are set forth in the preamble of the Constitution, where it is stated why the powers of the Constitution are granted, and among them why the power is vested in Congress "to borrow money." Those purposes set forth in the preamble to the Constitution involve the general-welfare clause, and Congress, therefore, by a reasonable interpretation of that instrument, has the right to borrow money on the credit of the United States for the purposes set forth in that preamble, to wit:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

And it is then declared, among other direct powers granted, that—

> The Congress shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

That power is as plain as the English language can make it. When that power is exercised for the benefit of the people of the United States, when it is exercised "to promote the general welfare," it is exercised in a constitutional manner under the purposes of the Constitution. It is exercised in this manner when it serves a sound public policy. It is exercised in this bill within the limit of good policy because it will afford a safe haven of deposit to timid depositors in periods of financial fear, and because it will prevent panic; it will give stability to our national commerce; it will prevent panic by giving a place where the funds of the people may be deposited when they are frightened. When they draw it out of the banks, they can put it in the hands of the General Government with the guaranty of the Government behind it, and because it will prevent panic, because it will prevent the paralysis of commerce, it will itself be an agency of the Government for "the regulation of commerce" between the States, giving it stability.

I think, further, Mr. President, that this bill is constitutional without the amendment of the Senator from Utah because it is a natural and a reasonable extension of the postal savings system. We have already for years been carrying on a banking method through the post-office system. The Supreme Court of the United States held in McCulloch v. Maryland that the Government of the United States had a right to establish a bank of the United States, and we have in effect been carrying on a banking business through the post-offices of the United States under the authority of the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I call attention to the magnitude of these transactions, amounting to six or seven hundred million dollars per annum, and I will ask to put in the RECORD a telegram from the Post-Office Department giving these transactions during the last three or four years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be inserted.

The telegram is as follows:

C. A. MCGONAGLE, Acting Auditor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, believing that this bill is constitutional without the amendment of the Senator from Utah, believing that the substitute which I have offered for it will suffice and will avoid the objection of withdrawing these funds from the communities where deposited, I believe the Senate ought to adopt the substitute, because it meets the objection offered by the Senator from New York and by other Senators in defense of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah that we will need additional ready funds to meet the demands of depositors over and above what the banks can furnish us in time of panic, and because it will make it unnecessary to withdraw these funds from the communities where deposited.

I call attention to the pledge made by the Republican party leaders at Chicago. The Republican national platform, adopted June 16, 1908, declares as follows:

> We favor the establishment of a postal savings-bank system for the convenience of the people and the encouragement of thrift.

Obviously, the leaders of the Republican party, representing, as they did, every State in the Union, believed in the constitutionality of this pledge made to the American people. I wish, however, to call particular attention to the meaning of the kind of a postal savings bill that was proposed. I hold in my hand the postal savings bill offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], April 2, 1908. Section 11 provides—

> That the Postmaster-General shall, as herein provided—
> "Shall," not "may"—
> deposit postal savings-bank funds in national banks to be designated by him, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum. Such deposits shall be made in national banks in the States and Territories in which the funds are received, and when possible in the counties in which such funds are received, and, as far as practicable, in the immediate vicinity of the places at which funds are so received. If any bank in which such funds are so deposited shall become insolvent, such funds shall be a prior lien upon its assets and shall be first paid, to the exclusion of all other indebtedness of every kind and nature whatsoever. Where it is not practicable to deposit such funds in the counties, States, or Territories where they are received, they may be deposited in national banks at the nearest practicable points thereto or invested in state, territorial, county, or municipal bonds, to be selected by the Postmaster-General with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General.

Mr. President, the Republican party went before the country with this proposal. Here was the postal savings bill upon which they went to the people of the United States, proposing that these funds should be deposited, as far as practicable, in the vicinity from which they were drawn, and, if they could not be so deposited, were to be invested in local securities. I say flatly that this new proposal is a palpable breach of faith. This proposal does not intend to leave these funds in the vicinity where deposited, and in case there is no place of deposit, this original bill proposed that these funds should be invested in local securities. But now the leaders of the Republican party come before the Senate of the United States proposing, not the investment in local banks nor in local securities, but that the money shall be invested in the securities of the United States far away from the place of deposit.

However, Mr. President, I may appeal in vain to the good faith of those charged with the administration of the affairs of that great party; but I call their attention to it, and I call the attention of the people of the United States to it, and I warn you that the people of the United States will hold you to a strict accountability for your wide departure from the promises made to them both in your platform and upon the rostrum.

Mr. President, the Democratic party likewise as an alternative pledged itself to a postal savings system; and while they may not put into effect the policies for which they stood, at the same time their declaration, together with the declaration of the Republican party through their leaders, in favor of a postal savings-bank system was a commitment on the part of all the people of the United States, through both parties, as to their belief in the constitutionality of a postal savings system which keeps the money at the place of its original deposit.

Mr. President, I am one Democrat who believes in the wisdom of all of the people. I believe that all of the people know more than some of the people. The people in effect have declared it to be constitutional, and I believe that the people are right about it. I believe the bill is constitutional without the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah. And the policy declared by the Democratic party in its platform and the policy in effect declared by the Republicans in their platform can be carried out by the amendment which I have offered as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, while the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is an obvious breach of faith on the part of the Republican leaders and a violation of a promise made to the people of the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma offers as a substitute for the pending amendment as amended the following:

Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, the immediate repayment of depositors of the postal savings bank requires it, he may authorize the issuance of temporary certificates of indebtedness of the Treasury bearing 3 per cent interest to the extent required to meet such contingency.

Mr. President, I can not, on behalf of the committee, accept that amendment, and I trust the Senator from Oklahoma will not press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. OWEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I again announce that upon this amendment I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I will therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and withhold my vote.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BURROWS (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of my pair I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to announce again that my colleague [Mr. ELKINS] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I will not make any further announcement of the pair on any additional roll calls to-day.

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—4.

Chamberlain	Gore	Owen	Stone

NAYS—59.

Bankhead	Crane	Gallinger	Purcell
Beveridge	Crawford	Gamble	Rayner

So Mr. OWEN's amendment to the amendment of Mr. SMOOT was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I again announce that on this amendment and all others I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present I am authorized by him to say he would vote "yea." If he were present, and I were free to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague is paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is necessarily absent. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BURROWS (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is unavoidably absent, and on this vote is paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 24, as follows:

So Mr. SMOOT's amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer an amendment, to which the Senator in charge of the bill makes no objection, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Panama Canal Zone," in line 5, on page 9, insert the words:

And the word "bank" shall be held to include savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am of the opinion that savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business would be within the purview of the bill as it now stands, but through a superabundance of caution I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to record my protest against the amendment. The idea of bringing trust companies in here as depositories on an even plane with national banks and regular banking institutions is a new proposition, and it has not as yet received that consideration which would seem to justify anyone in accepting it offhand. An amendment can not be accepted by a Senator who reports a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, nobody has asked that that procedure be had. The amendment is before the Senate for action.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am before the Senate for action also. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator usually is.

Mr. HEYBURN. And he usually knows how to get there and how to stay there, too. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that we have undertaken here to span a wide gap with a very quickly devised and flimsy structure. There are 40 kinds of trust companies in the United States. The mails are full of advertisements, attractive inducements offered by bankers in cities like New York, who have nothing but a private office in some building. They buy bank furniture and call themselves "bankers." There is not a Senator, I imagine, on the floor who does not receive these from men who call themselves "bankers." If we are going to include such institutions within the provisions of the bill authorized to receive this money the language should be very carefully selected. Very careful provision should be made against these irresponsible speculative institutions.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield, and to whom?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not through; but I will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to suggest to the Senator that if such an institution had no capital or no reserve, under the provisions of the bill they could not make a deposit with them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this seems to me to send us back to where we were about three months ago, when we were dealing with the question as to the character of the institutions that might receive these deposits; and we are asked here without consideration or discussion to vote for it. At that time we included national banks, state banks, and savings banks, but not trust companies.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it not true that the trust companies in most of the States, certainly in many of them, are savings banks as well as trust companies? In nearly every town in the States of the Middle West the trust companies are among the soundest of our financial institutions. I do not know how it is in the Senator's own State, but they are chosen by the people frequently as a place of safe deposit where they can get good interest on their investment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a very large proportion of the trust companies are not authorized directly by their charters, whether it be merely articles of incorporation under the laws of the State or by some other authority, to do a banking business. They are not authorized to do it. They do it. They do what they call a banking business, but they have not the authority of their charters to transact such business. I have had plenty of opportunity in quite an active business and professional life to know something about how these things are done. I recall institutions calling themselves trust companies that professed to do a banking business until there came a demand from those who had deposited with them to return it, and it was found that, being trust companies and free from the restrictions and limitations of banks, they had placed the money where it was not available, and they were no longer banks—they were insolvent debtors.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that the amendment being offered suddenly, without being printed, the Senator through abundance of caution raises a question concerning it. I wish to briefly state my understanding of what the amendment proposes.

The bill provides that the banks in which these funds are to be deposited shall be solvent banks, subject to state or national supervision and examination. This proposed amendment does not eliminate the qualification of state organization or examination or supervision, but extends a definition so as to make the savings banks thus organized and subject to such examination and the trust companies doing a banking business a part of the definition of banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not, in my judgment, extend a definition; it extends a classification of mediums——

Mr. CARTER. Possibly it might accomplish both.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of mediums through which this money is to be handled. It is startling to me that it should be brought back after we had been told it had been withdrawn. I guess it has been trailing along after us all the time. I want the bill to have that provision taken out of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it not an extension of the classification within the definition?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho, if a bank is doing a savings bank and a trust business at the same time, whether he would understand this amendment to preclude a deposit in that class of a bank? I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that the largest bank we have in West Virginia is one that I am connected with. It has about $5,000,000 of deposits, and is a savings and trust company. I certainly would not want anything to be brought up here that would prevent the largest bank in my State from being a depository of this fund.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Senator from West Virginia if the institution to which he has just alluded engages in the purchase of bonds and other investment securities or undertakes to finance various industrial enterprises?

Mr. SCOTT. In reply to the Senator from Texas I will state that the corporation with which I am connected reloans money upon real estate, upon mortgages, as a rule, at not to exceed 60 per cent of the appraised value of the property.

Mr. BAILEY. I asked the question with a view of saying that I think it would hardly be safe to accept money payable on demand and then invest it in any sort of an industrial enterprise. It is hardly safe to accept money with a promise to pay it on demand and then invest it even in mortgages on land, because, while that is the best security in the world, it is not the most easily convertible If you are going to take the money of the people and promise to pay it on demand—which promise has not been made in this bill, notwithstanding the statement that it is to be payable on demand—you ought to be always prepared to redeem that promise.

I hope you are going to expressly provide that it shall be returned to the depositor on demand. I hardly think it would be safe for the Government of the United States to accept these deposits payable on demand and then invest them in securities which the national-bank law itself prohibits national banks to accept, not upon the very ground that they are an unsafe or an insufficient security, but upon the ground that they are not a liquid security.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am indebted to the Senator from Texas for the elaboration of that idea. I will carry it further. If we adopt this amendment, we give to the trust companies and savings banks a higher status than national banks, because, confessedly, they loan their money upon real estate and mortgages. A national bank can not do that. They do not even have the restrictions applied to national banks.

Mr. President, the people of this country, clamoring, as they have been, for postal savings banks, would repudiate this idea with such an overwhelming vote as that those offering it would want to forget the measure. We drag in here institutions that represent $4,000,000,000 of the money of this country. In a minute we pick up this old discarded corpse and undertake to electrify it into life. Four weeks ago the Senate would not listen to it, and those having charge of the bill did not consider it safe at all to urge it. They said, in talking of it, "We have dropped out those features." They have been kept evidently close at hand.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator is evidently thinking of some discussion at a public dinner in the city. In the opinion of the committee, this text, as it now stands unamended, will permit the deposit of funds in savings banks or in other banks or in trust companies doing a banking business. The Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators concerned desired that that should not be subject to construction. The savings banks of this country are the most substantial institutions in the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, why not put them all in?

Mr. CARTER. Because of the fact that the savings banks are not sufficiently distributed over the country to keep this money in the localities where it is received.

Mr. BAILEY. And the purpose of this bill is to provide a savings bank, not to regulate commerce or do any of those other things of which we have heard.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not intended to borrow money on the credit of the Government. Is the idea of the Government borrowing money through the instrumentality of the savings banks consistent with what we have heard here in the last two or three days, that the constitutionality of this bill would be assured, because it was a medium through which the Government could borrow money? Then we find that this medium is to be the savings banks. Did the Government ever appeal to those institutions at any hour of its need for financial assistance? Did the Government ever deposit public moneys of the United States in any savings bank?

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Government ever do that with a state bank?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet they are in this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. The state banks are in the bill, but it does not happen that I am discussing the state banks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know you are not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I propose to select exactly the subject I will discuss and to discuss it in my own way.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, you could not get 25 per cent of the vote of the District of Columbia to support a measure of that kind, and if you will send it out to the country you will find yourselves where this Government has upon more than one occasion found itself. You will find yourselves under the necessity of going into the Treasury of the United States to pick up the losses of an institution that will be held to have been created without authority of law or to have come into existence without authority of law. Suppose you start out with a scheme of this kind—national banks, state banks, savings banks, and the Rock of Gibraltar?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a good quartet.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why not name the distinguished citizen mentioned in a measure that was before us two days ago, who is going to establish a great foundation based upon two or three hundred million dollars? Why not include that institution as one of the instrumentalities that could be used in this matter? It is probably as solvent as any of the savings banks of the country and represents as much capacity to meet obligations.

Mr. President, if we start these instrumentalities to work and they gather in a few million or a few hundred million dollars and then the law is to be tested in the Supreme Court of the United States and held to have conferred no rights at all, you are going to have a lot of the people's money on hand, and we are going to be called upon to devise some method of paying it back to them. It will be in trust companies, savings banks, national banks, and state banks. It occurred to me while I was listening to this fairy scheme to translate it into plain language. This is the proposition that is before you: When the Government is in danger from a foreign foe, the President may make war on the banks and the depositors therein. That is what it amounts to. The very time of all others when there should be no disturbance of credit or business relations, the President then says to these banks, "Bring up that five or six hundred million dollars here." They say it is out, it is loaned out in the ordinary course and process of banking. "Well, get it in." The bank says to the farmer or business man to whom he has loaned this money, "You must pay that loan." He says it is not due for sixty days or ninety days. It was loaned in the ordinary course of business. The Government has said to these people or these trustees, "There is an enemy at our gates; the war clouds are over us, and we want that money in thirty days." The banks have loaned it for ninety days. What is going to happen in that margin of sixty days? Do you suppose that the country will not have such a crash as we have not known, because we will not have the sunshine of peace and placid business relations upon the country, but we will have war, because it can only be done when war threatens or the contingencies of possible war arise.

It is appalling to think that in a moment we should undertake to transform this plan which, by name, is dear to the people into an engine for the destruction of the people. As was suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], there is not a provision in the bill as to the manner in which the depositor can get the money out. We provide for gathering it in. That is probably not for the benefit of the depositor. It takes it out of his possession, but we do not provide or profess to provide for getting it out. There is no provision by which this money can be taken out of the depository by the depositor.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a criticism on the bill, not the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I am taking that case just now in my resentment against this kind of legislation as emphasized by the proposal of an amendment that so shocks my sense of right and duty.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. At the proper time I should like to have the Senator give his thought to this proposition: In Vermont more than half of all our savings banks are savings banks and trust companies. They are subject to the same restrictions, the same charges, the same laws as the savings banks. The only difference is that the savings banks declare dividends on what they actually earn. The trust companies, by reason of having capital stock, are permitted to make a contract as to the rate of interest they will pay, but in no case can they invest their funds in any way other than is permitted to the savings bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am quite familiar with those proceedings. They are generally the back door of some national bank. The trust companies of the country, those that verge upon the principles of the savings banks, are ordinarily convenient mediums through which the national banks may violate the restrictions of law that surround them. I have some knowledge of it.

I saw the banks go down one after another like ninepins in 1893. There may have been some exceptions, but a proportion of them carried down with them or were carried by the back door labeled "savings banks."

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, that condition of things has never existed in Vermont as far as I know. Indeed, our banks, with the trust proviso, in Vermont are nearly all named savings banks and trust companies; for instance, the Lamoille County Savings Bank and Trust Company. They are savings banks in every particular, except that they have a capitalization which permits them to make a contract as to the rate paid. We have never had any failure in a great many years with any of our savings banks and trust companies in Vermont. In any event, the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho is incorrect so far as the State of Vermont is concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no doubt that up in Vermont, where experience has taught them to be conservative, they may perhaps stand above the average, but we are not legislating for Vermont alone. We must guard, frame, and enact this law so that it will work equally well in every section of the country. Simply because Vermont stands on a pedestal of ability and purity and solvency we can not afford to lay a trap here that shall drag down some other State or community that is not so blessed in the world's moral code.

Now, Mr. President, we have had an admission on the floor here within a few minutes that these trust companies loan their money upon real estate mortgages; that they loan it upon town property secured by mortgages. How are they going to realize upon that loan under the provisions of the amendment that we have just adopted here this morning? Suppose the Government says, "Bring this money in," and the banks say, "We have loaned it to the trust companies." Do not the banks loan money to the trust companies in Vermont?

Mr. PAGE. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho I am very proud of the fact that the trust companies in our times of great stress of finance have been oftentimes the salvation of the national banks. They have had more money than national banks, and they have loaned it to them to carry them through difficulties.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do the national banks in Vermont ever loan money to the trust companies?

Mr. PAGE. I was for four years in charge of the savings banks of Vermont as inspector, and I do not now recall any instance of that kind. Still it may exist.

Mr. HEYBURN. I recall some cases of it, and they were in the courts and the public records. A record of them will be found over here in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. I recall a number of cases. I could name them, but it is not necessary or wise to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was illegal, was it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. They had bonds. What restriction is there upon a national bank against loaning the money to a trust company? They could loan to a trust company as well as to an individual, and they did it. They loaned to the trust company, and I can name three of them, and the trust company loaned it out on real estate, and the bank came and the trust companies closed their doors, and within a few hours the banks that trust companies were indebted to closed their doors.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. That was true all over the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. Lest I forget it, I want to say to the Senator that I think I was wrong in that statement. I think I know that savings banks and trust companies sometimes do interchange deposits. Not as a matter of general business, but occasionally a savings bank in Vermont keeps a deposit with a national bank, and the converse of that proposition is true. But it is not a matter of loan to any great extent; it is merely an incident of general business.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just cast your memory back to the condition of affairs in New York in 1907. It was discovered when the savings bank closed its doors it carried two national banks with it, did it not? And when the inquiry was made, Why are these national banks closing their doors? they said it was because the savings banks—the trust company in one case—had closed their doors, and they owed the national banks money.

Mr. BULKELEY. I wish to correct the Senator, if he will permit me. In the bank failures in New York in 1907 no savings bank failed or stopped payment. There were two or three banking and trust companies, absolutely different, that failed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course the Senator knows exactly what instance I had reference to, and that illustrates the danger of this thing. You call them "trust companies" in one breath and "savings banks" in another; and in another, if occasion requires, you have a new name for them.

Mr. BULKELEY. I must persist that the likeness which the Senator attempts to draw is not correct. The savings bank of New York to which I particularly alluded is the largest one, probably, in the country, carrying deposits of more than $100,000,000 of savings. That has no comparison with or likeness to the trust company in Wall street and the trust company in Fifth avenue which failed in that panic and carried down the banks with them.

Mr. HEYBURN. The trust companies are included in this amendment. That is what I am objecting to. I am objecting to the very institutions belonging to the class the Senator refers to. They did carry down the national banks not only there, but they carried down national banks thousands of miles away from there that were doing business with them.

Mr. BULKELEY. But the trust companies to which the Senator refers had no savings-bank character whatsoever and were not so recognized under the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. No distinction is drawn here in this amendment between them and other trust companies.

Mr. BULKELEY. I was not discussing the amendment; I was discussing the statement of the Senator. I want to say further, while I am on my feet, the investment of savings banks and trust companies under the law in bonds and mortgages seems to have been severely criticised by the Senator because they are not immediately available. Now, if he will refer to the provisions of the bill, he will find that provision is made in this very bill for the investment of these funds in the same securities, under certain conditions, as the savings banks of the States of New York and of California invest their funds, and that is largely in bonds and mortgages.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that still in the bill?

Mr. BULKELEY. It is still in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is an amendment—I did not know but that it might have been adopted—to take that out of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am anticipating the privilege of saying a word in favor of my amendment at the proper time. I want to ask my good friend from Idaho how he is going to square his position with this fact? He says national banks loan their money to trust companies and the trust companies wreck the national banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I know of three.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the bill we are providing that this money shall be put in national banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet under existing conditions the national banks are being wrecked by the trust companies. Hence, if they had this money, I am afraid the depositors might have some trouble in getting it, if the national banks were wrecked under existing conditions by trust companies. I do not see how the Senator improves the situation by making that argument.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the situation could not be improved by that argument or by any other. It only illustrates the reasonable grounds upon which this bill is being attacked.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill itself?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I have not contended that the provision that the money should be deposited in the national banks was a safe one. I have never for a moment favored it. If you are going to have a savings bank with the credit of the United States behind it, then put the laws of the United States squarely behind it, and do not have any air cushions between them, for that is all this commission is.

If I were going to support a postal savings-bank bill to protect the depositor in such banks, I would put the money either in the Treasury of the United States or where the Government of the United States would be directly responsible for it; and I would see that it was there when the depositor wanted it. These subterfuges do not appeal to me. The relabeling and misbranding of legislation is as vicious as when applied to food products. This is a clear case of misbranding. I have studied it from day to day, and listened to the arguments which have been advanced for and against it, and my mind I believe is settled to the conclusion that it would be a vicious piece of legislation to occupy the minds of the legislators only in the interest of the use of the money by those who can borrow it to the exclusion of the rights of the parties who deposit it. I have not heard in all of this discussion any serious consideration given to the rights and the privileges of the depositor. I have heard labored financial arguments as to what the banks would do with it and what they would not, and as to what they could do, and what they could not; but I have heard no argument as to the depositor's relation to this money or how he was to regain it.

This is a bill to encourage thrift. In whom? In the banks. The advocates of the bill do not go any further in discussing it. It is to encourage thrift. Well, as I read it, it is to encourage thrift in the depository. How does it encourage thrift in the depositor to stand here for weeks discussing and providing for the use that the banks of the country and the trust companies, and the insurance companies next, will make of this money. I do not see it in the light that some Senators have placed it. If you will spend one hour in considering provisions for the protection of the depositor, and providing a method by which he can withdraw his money, the country will, I think, get more wisdom than it has yet had in the discussion of this measure.

Insurance companies do a banking business—lots of them. Why not include them? It would be no more absurd than to include trust companies. The words "trust company" have no legal significance or definition. No boundaries have been established by any statute or by any decision of the courts as to what a trust company may do and what it may not do. The word "trust" is one borrowed from the general sentiment in human language. It had no application to business. We have the trust reposed in trustees appointed by courts or by individuals, and it is so various and so varied in its character as to be unclassified, and it is not subject to classification. "Trust" means nothing as applied in this amendment, and the organizations that brand themselves with that name are as varied in the character of the business that they engage in as is the locality in which they do engage in business.

I am astonished to find a sentiment here in favor of an immediate vote adding two new classes of financial institutions to the enumerated classes in the bill in which the money may be deposited. What next are we to expect—insurance companies? They do a banking business—lots of them. They take men's money and keep it, subject to repayment, and they repay it and loan it and collect it in and loan it again. That is a banking business. Individuals do it. I have in mind a bank owned by an individual. He owns it himself; he does a banking business; he is solvent; he is very solvent. Why should he not be included?

I should like to have been able to support a measure that represented the composite wisdom of the Senate on this matter. I am not appalled by the threat, based upon the provision, or the point, if you may call it so, in the platform of the Republican party, because the men who were behind that statement never dreamed that Congress would enact a law such as this. The declaration was, "We believe in a system of postal savings banks that shall encourage thrift." Does that call upon us to inaugurate a new system of banking here that has for its prime consideration the men who get hold of the money and gives no consideration to those who loan it or deposit it, as you may choose to term it? Think you that the Republican party in this Nation ever dreamed that Congress was going to make out of that innocent declaration in the platform a juggernaut that would crush out the interest of these people and tie them to the chariot wheels of the banks of the country? I am not one of those who inveigh against bankers and banking in the legitimate scope of their business. There is not a drop of that sentiment or that blood in my veins. But we are dealing here with a new principle, so far as applied to this Government, and it behooves us to give it careful consideration and reconsideration, so as to guard against hasty and imperfect action that shall fail utterly to express the sentiment of the people or afford them the relief or the benefit intended under that promise.

Here, as the bill stands now amended, it provides that this commission, not the President, but that this commission may demand without limit in one day or in ten hours or in any other time repayment of all of this money or any part of it from the depositories, including trust companies, savings banks, national banks, state banks—may demand that it all come into the Treasury and be converted into the bonds of the United States.

The amendment now limits that and cuts it to 2 per cent bonds. The amendment as it now stands does not permit the Government to borrow money in case of war from these funds for less than 2½ per cent, when we are now and have been borrowing money for 2 per cent. What wisdom is there in a restriction of that kind? A war cloud rises, and this commission and the President, acting cojointly perhaps, say, "We need now a great fund to meet the exigencies of this hour," and they issue a call to all of the banks and trust companies, safe deposit companies, and state banks to bring in this money that was loaned to them under the provisions of this bill upon which they are paying, which they hold subject to a contract, held by right, and have a right to loan. They say, "Bring it in." The reply is, "We can not do it." What is the result? Then, in a few hours or a few days you will have a financial crisis the like of which has not been known in this country. Not only that, you will have the war just the same. Of all times on earth, why should you select the hour of war for the hour of distress financially? It is inevitable; and now you come in and add these two classes of depositories and put them on an equal basis with the banks of the United States, and you give the power of selection to this commission.

Mr. President, I shall not support it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have taken a very few minutes time during the entire discussion of this bill and feel highly gratified that I am permitted now to say a word in favor of the amendment that I submitted. I did not know when I offered the amendment that it would bring down on my devoted head the flow of oratory on the part of the Senator from Idaho to which we have listened. I did not know when I offered it that it had ever been considered before, or that it had received consideration by the Senate in any form whatever, and I am entirely ignorant of that fact now, except that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has intimated that it had received such consideration. I do not know when or where it had such consideration.

This bill, I think, is subject to criticism, and I shall not take exception to the criticism the Senator from Idaho has bestowed upon it. But the bill is here, and it is conceded on all hands that the bill is to pass this body.

Mr. President, the bill as constructed—and I am not responsible for it in any way—has a provision "that all regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed" by the board of trustees. That provision is in the bill. So that that board, if we have any confidence in it, will, after all, have jurisdiction of this matter so far as the custody and investment of the money is concerned.

There is another provision in the bill that this money may be deposited in national and state banks:

> Whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination.

Mr. President, for the life of me I can not understand why we shall deposit this money in the little state banks, scattered all over the country, some of them with a capital possibly less than $25,000, and refuse to deposit any part of it in our very prosperous and solvent savings banks and such trust companies as are doing a banking business throughout the United States. If there is any valid reason for it, I confess I have been unable to discover it.

The Senator from Idaho argues that trust companies have failed. So they have failed, and so have national banks failed. Mr. President, I regret to say that I am older than the Senator from Idaho, and I remember the time when, in 1857, a large proportion of the state banks of the country went tumbling down like a row of bricks. The Senator from Idaho does not remember that, but it is a fact. And yet we have got just that same character of banks in this bill, and we are going to deposit some of this money in those banks, and the Senator from Idaho proposes to deny that privilege to the prosperous, solvent, well-regulated, state-examined savings banks and trust companies in certain portions of this country. I do not for the life of me see the philosophy of the argument that the Senator from Idaho has so ably presented, as he always presents his arguments with great ability. The Senator argues that this money will be loaned out by savings banks and trust companies and will not be on call. That is equally true of national banks and state banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. They can not loan it out for more than ninety days.

Mr. GALLINGER. National banks can not loan it out for more than ninety days, but state banks can, and state banks doubtless will.

Mr. HEYBURN. They can loan it out on real estate indefinitely.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. I said a moment ago that I did not want to occupy the attention of the Senate except briefly. The older I grow the less inclined I am to say a single word in this body; but I do want to emphasize the fact that if this bill is to stand as it is to-day and we are going to loan this money to national and state banks, under national and state supervision, there is no reason on earth why we should deny it to savings banks, and to trust companies that are doing a banking business. There is certainly no greater danger in putting this money in a savings bank that has millions of dollars to its credit than there can be in putting it in a little state bank in some obscure town that has a capital of a few hundred or a few thousand dollars and that is not subjected to the supervision that our savings banks are subjected to. Why, Mr. President, in the State of New Hampshire we have a bank commission composed of three men, who are giving attention to our savings banks by way of examination infinitely more thorough and complete than is the examination by one man appointed by the President of the United States and called a "national-bank examiner," whose duty it is to examine our national banks.

Mr. President, if this money is to go into the national and state banks, they are quite as likely to get into financial trouble as any of the other financial organizations of the country, and there is neither logic nor justice in denying it to the classes of banks that I have named in the amendment which I have submitted.

I will say again, Mr. President, that when I offered that amendment I had not the least notion that the question had ever been discussed before, and I am sure it has not been discussed on the floor of the Senate during the consideration of this bill; but whether it has or not, the amendment is a proper one, and I trust it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, before that vote is taken, I move to strike out the words "and trust companies doing a banking business."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment offered by Mr. GALLINGER it is proposed to strike out the words "and trust companies doing a banking business," so as to read:

> And the word "bank" shall be held to include savings banks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. CLAPP. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I move to amend by striking out, on page 5, line 6, all after the word "on" down to and including the word "thereof," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fractions of a dollar."

The matter, Mr. President, relates to the computation of interest. The text as it now reads is as follows:

> But interest shall not be computed or allowed on any amount less than $1, or some multiple thereof.

Certain Senators have suggested that that language might be subject to misconstruction as it reads, and inasmuch as the direct purpose is to avoid the necessity of computing interest on fractions of a dollar, the better course seems to be to state directly what is meant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, page 5, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "any amount less than $1 or some multiple thereof" and insert "fractions of a dollar," so that, if amended, it will read:

But interest shall not be computed or allowed on fractions of a dollar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is a pretty big item. It will amount to some hundreds of thousands of dollars, and it is against the depositor. There is another little strike at the depositor and in favor of the savings banks. That sounds like a small item on its face, but when you undertake to say that no interest shall be computed upon fractions of a dollar, and take a pencil and figure it up, you will find that you have a pretty big item. I merely call attention to it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not understand that interest is figured on fractions of a dollar on deposits anywhere. This amendment merely provides that if a given depositor has to his credit $52.13, the interest will not have to be figured on the 13 cents.

Mr. HEYBURN. But suppose it is 99 cents?

Mr. CARTER. The interest is computed in the same way. The expense of the computation would generally exceed the sum involved.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, now that is another excuse for it—that it will be too expensive to count up the interest on sums less than $1. The chances are that more than half of these deposits will have at the end of them 30, 50, 80, or 95 cents, on which no interest will be paid.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho overlooks the fact that all deposits are to be made in dollars or multiples thereof.

Mr. HEYBURN. These are multiples; 70 cents is a multiple.

Mr. CARTER. Of a dollar? Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a cumulative multiple, and would come within the provisions of the bill, the Senator will find, just as much as 10 cents would. If you have become so reckless that you are going to drive right through this thing, all right, do it and take the responsibility and ride in the car. It reminds me of the old saying, "Rattle his bones over the stones; he is only a pauper"—that is, the depositor—but to the great banks and trust companies that have the money you must give the right to charge interest on fractions. I hear of no prohibition against them. It is only the poor depositor, with a few pennies or a few dollars, that shall be deprived of the right to receive interest upon fractions of a dollar, and the fraction is just as likely to be 75 cents or 95 cents as it is to be 10 cents or 5 cents.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if I remember correctly, the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], in conjunction with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], claimed the other day that it was going to involve an immense expense to conduct the machinery of the postal savings-bank system. The expense involved would be increased materially by the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho that we compute interest on fractions of dollars. But the point I want to make in connection with this matter is that the suggestions of the Senator from Idaho and of the Senator from Texas, as to the large expense that would grow out of this machinery, seem to me to be almost absurd. I want to say as a fact that a good, competent bookkeeper in an ordinary savings bank, such as we have in the country, will keep accounts of a million dollars of deposits if you do not include fractions of dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will he keep the accounts of a million depositors?

Mr. PAGE. He will keep the accounts of a million dollars as they run through the year in an ordinary account, and, as I understand, the present prospect of the amount of the deposits under this bill is that they will aggregate in the near future $500,000,000; in other words, 500 good accountants would keep accounts amounting to $500,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, this is purely an economical measure?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to respond to the very courteous suggestion that what I said was absurd?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no doubt that a Vermont man can do all the Senator from that State says that he can. I have no doubt that Vermont men can do that much, because their Senator speaks, of course, from a personal knowledge of them; but I hardly think he will expect the remainder of the Senate to suppose that we are going to distribute Vermont men all over the United States to keep the various accounts. Consequently we must judge their efficiency by the ordinary standard, and not by the Vermont standard, which, of course, is very high. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the trouble with the Senator's proof of the absurdity is this: That while a man might be able to keep accounts aggregating a million dollars, or while he might be able to keep a million accounts—I have no doubt a Vermont man might have that facility—still, if you add to the Post-Office Department twenty minutes' work every day more than its present force can do, you must employ an additional man, and, of course, if he is a Vermont man, he could do all these things, and he would have about nine-tenths of his time unoccupied, but still the Government would have to pay for all of his time.

I think the Senator from Vermont did not exactly understand what I meant when I said that it would take at least 50,000 additional employees. I would never have made a statement of that kind if these employees could have been concentrated at one point. I have no doubt the work can be done with very much fewer men than that; and, of course, I would have divided it by 10, and probably by 100, if I had thought it was going to be concentrated in Vermont. [Laughter.] I only meant to say that as the post-offices are scattered all over the country, and as the bookkeepers in one post-office can not supplement the work or reduce the burden of the bookkeepers in other post-offices, we would find ourselves in the end required to employ something like 50,000 additional men.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am always glad to hear a good word for Vermont. [Laughter.] I want to say that I did have in mind a Vermont bookkeeper with Vermont surroundings when I said that one man could keep the accounts, as they usually run to the extent of a million dollars. When the Senator from Texas, as he did the other day, said that each post-office in the United States, to do the little business connected with that office, would have to employ one additional $900 man to do that business, when, as my experience goes, the bookkeeping for accounts aggregating a million dollars can be done by one man, I thought it went almost so far as to be an absurd proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the Senator considered the amount of these accounts? A million-dollar transaction might be included in two or three items, and that could be entered up in five or ten minutes, but we were discussing the proposition of the accounts, not of the amounts of the accounts.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have before me the report of the bank commissioners of Vermont. I find that in the bank to which I have particular reference the deposits aggregate $1,597,000. The total number of depositors was 4,396.

Mr. HEYBURN. That many accounts?

Mr. PAGE. One word. Four thousand three hundred and ninety-six accounts, aggregating $1,597,000. Those 4,396 accounts are all kept by two clerks—not only the seven particular and distinct items or entries that must be made in each account, but also all the bookkeeping connected with the entering up of bills receivable, the sending out of notices of interest due, the computation of interest due on notes. I will make this exception, that during the last half of December and June a clerk is called in for a few days to help compute the interest on the balance due depositors.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do I understand the Senator to say there were 1,400 accounts?

Mr. KEAN. Four thousand.

Mr. CARTER. Over 4,000.

Mr. PAGE. Four thousand three hundred and ninety-six, aggregating $1,597,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. The aggregate does not make any difference. It does not take any more clerks to make a "9" than it does to make a "2." I want to know——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, before the Senator from Vermont leaves that, just for the sake of having the RECORD exactly accurate, the Senator from Vermont must remember my statement was rather in the alternative and to the effect that either we would be required to appoint this large number of additional employees or else the present employees are doing less work than the Government is paying them to do. In other words, if they now have all they can do, to require them to do more work would be to impose upon them a task they could not perform, and consequently we would have to employ new men to do the new work if the old men are already doing all the work they can do.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if he still insists that in each of the little offices in the United States an additional clerk costing $900 would be essential?

Mr. BAILEY. I did not say that, because there are more than 50,000 post-offices in the United States, and of course I made due allowance for some of them. But I want to say this to the Senator from Vermont, and it is as true in Vermont as it is in the balance of the country: At some of these offices where you have a man of good sense, but without much preparation, he is able to take care of the present business of the post-office, but he will distrust his ability to keep these bank accounts, and you will find that even in the smallest of the post-offices where this work is imposed upon the postmaster you will have to get, in many cases, a new class of men.

I know many men who have ample sense to do this, but they have had no experience in bookkeeping, and they would not undertake it. They would absolutely resign their office before they would assume the responsibility. A man does not need learning for many of the things which he is required to do in this life and for this Government. He needs common sense, which I believe Patrick Henry once said "is worth all the larnin' in the world." But if a man is going to keep books, he needs some skill in bookkeeping, and any man who undertakes it without some knowledge or experience in it is apt to find his entries rather confused.

I have no doubt that at some of the very lowest post-offices, where the business would not require the employment of an additional clerk, or of any clerk at all, it still would result in requiring men of a different kind to keep the office.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. Just one moment, Senator, if you please. I should like to answer the Senator from Texas. I simply wish to express my opinion as against the opinion of the Senator from Texas. It is to this effect: That in modern bookkeeping in a bank the receiving of deposits is limited to a mere filling out of some blank in a slip. Any child 12 years old, of ordinary intelligence, could in two hours be made competent to do that work.

Mr. BAILEY. Do they have men of that kind for money-order clerks in the post-offices?

Mr. PAGE. This is a great deal less difficult.

Mr. BAILEY. The post-office money-order business is simpler than this; and no children are employed in it, unless it be in Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I do not expect any children to be employed in this service, Mr. President. I want to express the opinion that it will be in rare instances where the business of a post-office will be so increased by this system as to require any additional force.

Mr. BAILEY. The difference between the Senator and myself is not over how much a man can do after he is employed. I doubt whether the largest bank in this city, a bank with a capital and surplus aggregating, perhaps, $2,000,000, and deposits aggregating, perhaps, $5,000,000, with a vast number of accounts, has over five or six bookkeepers.

I do not underestimate the capacity of the bookkeeper, but I contend that if the men already in the post-office are doing all that the Government requires of them, and if their time is now fully occupied, you can not expect them to do this additional work, and you must therefore employ additional help; and when you employ that additional help, it will not be a question whether his time is completely and fully occupied; not at all. Nobody who works for the Government has his time completely and fully occupied now except the Senators of the United States who do their work properly. If they had more time, they would still have less time than their work requires. But almost everybody else in government service comes at 9 and leaves at 4.30. If some of them did not come at all or left a little earlier, it would be that much better. I think I am safe in saying that amongst all the faithful and efficient employees of the Government none of them will be required to do much more than they are doing now, and that for every new duty imposed on them there will be an increase in the standing army of employees throughout this country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. I desire to interrupt the Senator from Idaho for just one moment, to say that, in my judgment, the Senator from Texas overestimates by tenfold, and I do not know but by twenty or fifty fold the amount of work that will be required to be done.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been making some figures while the Senator from Vermont was stating his proposition. Of course we must take into consideration the limit upon the amount of the account in determining the number of accounts. The Senator spoke of how much clerical expense there was in connection with accounts amounting to a million dollars, but if we will take these and put them, say, on the basis of $100 for each depositor, which is $20 more than the estimate for every million dollars, you will have 10,000 clerks on the basis of the statement of the Senator from Vermont. I have the figures in my hand. Upon that basis, to handle that money, divided into as many accounts as that sum would be, in the postal savings system, it would take 10,000 clerks for every million dollars, and for five hundred millions of dollars—why, I am lost in figures. [Laughter.] There is no answer. The Senator from Vermont must raise his estimate or else we are going to be drowned in figures.

Mr. PAGE. I simply want to say that they have a different arithmetic in Idaho than we have in Vermont.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, I think not. You take a million dollars and divide it up by 100 and it is not difficult to determine that the result is 10,000, and if, according to the estimate stated by the Senator from Vermont you must have so many clerks to handle a million dollars, you will find that is what you will need. But you will not need them, because the clerks will render more efficient service than that.

I merely wanted to demonstrate the fact that the figures given by the Senator from Vermont could not be applied to the postal savings-bank bill. I have made some figures here which I think are more reliable. They are based upon the ordinary business methods in banks, taking as a basis the number of clerks they require for so many accounts—and that is the way banks estimate their business—active accounts vary very little in the amount of work necessary to keep them on the books of the banks, and we know pretty well how many clerks it takes to handle a given number of accounts. We know that under the provisions of this bill you can not talk about the number of clerks necessary to handle $1,000,000; you must talk about the number of clerks necessary to handle so many accounts.

If you will take the amount proposed here as the money that would be received, say, within one or two years, assuming $500,000,000 for purposes of convenience in estimating, you will find that you will add, upon the accepted basis by which banks are governed, resulting from their experience, 50,000 employees to keep these accounts, the entries of going and coming debit and credit. When I say "keeping the accounts" I do not mean filling in the blanks in a deposit slip.

I mean keeping the accounts through all the ramifications of bookkeeping. There is something more to do than to have a man fill in a blank showing a customer has deposited so many dollars. The item has to be carried to books, a letter has to be written transmitting it to the place of deposit, another letter has to be written to tell the man who sent it that it has been received. One can imagine the multiplied correspondence that would follow. We must take that into consideration. Fifty thousand clerks at an average of $1,000 a year, and where are you? Fifty thousand clerks at an average of $500 a year, and where are you? Has anybody gone into those figures? We go along here with a sense of irresponsible assurance—and I do not say that in an invidious way at all, but that is what it seems like—dancing down here like some one utterly irresponsible, with our only object in view to get to the end of something. The Senator says "Let us get to a vote." We had better never get to a vote on a bad measure. You had better spend the rest of your lives talking about a bad measure. The Senator from Vermont, notwithstanding that he disagreed with my criticism of his particular amendment, left the impression upon our minds that his conscience is disturbed about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. A trifle.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and I would like to see some Senator stand in his place here and say that this bill suits him. I have not yet seen it. And ought we to force the issue under those circumstances? I think not.

We are going to be called upon to vote here upon this amendment which takes away from the depositor the benefit of interest upon all fractions of a dollar. Why not take it away from the other man? Why not make a corresponding provision in computing the interest against the bank by the Government that the Government shall not pay upon any fraction of a dollar? That would seem fair. I care not whether it amounts to $10 or $10,000,000; the principle is wrong to say that a depositor shall not have interest upon any fraction of a dollar; and yet you leave the others, who are to handle this money, to pass it from one to the other, to collect full interest. You had better think about that before you vote upon it. If there were no other feature in it than that spirit of injustice, I would not support it; and whatever the vote may be here, before the bill reaches the sifting process through which it must pass, it will not have a friend on earth nor a mourner at its funeral.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in order to render less objectionable certain features of this measure, I submit an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert the following, to stand as section 13, next to the last section in the bill:

SEC. 13. Whenever the bank or banks situated in any city, town, or village shall have on deposit a less amount of postal deposits than has been received by the local post-office in such city, town, or village, any such bank or banks entitled to receive the same shall, upon application to the board of trustees, be entitled to receive within thirty days the amount of such postal deposits applied for: Provided, That such amount shall not raise the aggregate of such deposits in such bank or banks above the total postal deposits in the local post-office, and it shall be the duty of the board of trustees within thirty days after such application to supply the amount thus applied for, the same to be taken from the banks situated in a city and in a State wherein the amount of postal deposits held by the banks shall exceed the amount deposited in the post-office of such city and the post-offices of such State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it has been my steadfast intention, and I have uniformly avowed that intention, to vote for this measure upon its final passage. I had intended to support the bill until it received at the hands of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a hypodermic injection of constitutionality. It is passing strange—perhaps I should add it is wondrous pitiful—that when this measure was desirable it was unconstitutional, and when it becomes constitutional it is undesirable. But the Senator from Utah has experienced another supernatural illumination. For my own part, I am unwilling to follow this ignis fatuus; I am unwilling to follow this will-o'-the-wisp; not from the marshes, but from the mountains.

Mr. President, I had quieted my questionings and had resolved to vote for this measure, because it was alleged that it would confer benefits and blessings upon the poor of this country. The poor have too seldom been the direct beneficiaries of our legislation. I marveled at the tender solicitude which had suddenly sprung up in behalf of those who by Divine assurance will always abide with us. But I was unwilling to be driven from my friendship for the poor, I was unwilling to be driven from my friendship for the laboring man by these new allies from strange and unexpected quarters.

But, Mr. President, I am now convinced that the pending measure is the forerunner of a central bank. I believe that this measure is a Trojan horse and that a central bank will be found within its hollow sides, armed for the destruction of those whom it professes to befriend.

I believe that the object, that the purpose of the pending bill, is to necessitate and to create a central bank in the United States. This conclusion is based first upon the circular issued by the National City Bank of New York, recently read to the Senate by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that the principal champion of a central bank in the Senate and in the United States was hostile to this measure one year ago. He is a man of matured judgment and of fixed convictions. The reasons which have wrought this change in his convictions or, at least, in his tactics have not been submitted to the Senate. Where is Roderick now? Did he imagine that his presence would excite, or that his absence would allay, suspicion?

There are two obstacles in the way of a central bank: First, the hostility of the people, and, second, the hostility of the bankers themselves. This measure is designed to placate the one and to overpower the other. The bankers are not willing for a central bank to be instituted under existing conditions. The national bankers own some $700,000,000 of United States bonds. They are the basis of the bank circulation of this country. That privilege is a large element in their value. Divested of the power of issue, these bonds would naturally decline in the market. Judged by the securities of other countries, perhaps the privilege of issue contributes 20 per cent to the value of our outstanding securities. If a central bank of issue were created, if the national banks were divested of the privilege and the power of issuing circulating notes, these bonds would decline in value upon their hands. The bankers are therefore hostile to the establishment of a central bank. Under existing conditions it would shipwreck their fortunes and their prosperity.

But, sir, the passage of this measure in its amended form would to some extent placate the bankers of the country. It would provide a market for their bonds. The earnings of the poor, the widow's mite, would be taken from the postal depositories and invested in the securities of the United States now held by national banks as a basis for their circulation. Sir, this would propitiate the bankers. It would pave the way for the central bank of issue. It would eliminate from the pathway of those who would create this central bank that element of opposition which is peculiarly entitled to their respect and to their consideration. The President has already said, in his Milwaukee speech, that the national bankers were "buncoed" into buying the 2 per cent bonds. If the bondholders were "buncoed," then the breadwinners are being "buncoed" now, so we have equal wrongs if not equal rights. I borrow the classic word "bunco" from His Excellency the President of the United States.

I hazard the prediction now that the safeguard sought to be erected by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will be swept away in the House or in conference, and if not, then by construction or by future legislation.

Mr. President, this measure will accomplish another object. It will overpower the hostility of the people to a central bank. When $700,000,000 of bonds are purchased, there must be a corresponding contraction in the national-bank notes of the country. There must be a shrinkage in our volume of money amounting to some five or six hundred million dollars.

A shrinkage of that sort would cause a crisis, would precipitate a panic, would create an emergency, and the Senator from New York and the Senator from Utah and others who on yesterday were crying "My kingdom for an exigency!" would find their demand supplied by an overproduction of panics and emergencies.

Contract the currency five or six hundred million dollars, and you create a void, you create a vacuum in our circulating medium; you create a hiatus between the demand and the supply of currency which would be an overpowering necessity. Relief of some sort would be absolutely indispensable, and legislation of some kind would be absolutely inevitable. Then the friends of the central bank would recommend that institution to Congress and to the country as the only institution whereby to meet the emergency; the only institution that could bring relief. That, sir, in my judgment, is the purpose of the pending bill. It comes in the guise of friendship for the poor. But again, Mr. President, as so often in the past, the poor man is called upon to administer the poison unto himself.

I marvel not that the poor are again to be crucified, but I protest that he should again be betrayed by a kiss. I am unwilling to contribute to the establishment of a central bank, either directly or indirectly. We once had a Bank of the United States vested with the power of issuing notes, but not vested with a monopoly upon that issue, and, sir, that institution dominated the finances of the country, debauched legislation, and threatened the liberties of our people. But that institution could not compare with the power of the one now in contemplation. I desire upon the very threshold to protest against this measure, and to protest against every other measure which has, directly or indirectly, for its motive or its object the creation of a central bank which will be crowned and sceptered as the financial dictator and despot of this Republic.

Mr. President, I am willing to set the dove on her own eggs to hatch out peace and promise for the poor, but I am unwilling to set the dove upon the serpent's eggs, which when hatched out are to sting both the mother and the poor unto the death. I can not vote for this measure, since it has been converted from a buckler for the protection of the people into a guillotine for their destruction.

I ask to have appended to my speech a pamphlet which I have in my hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Oklahoma will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, March, 1910.

[Those desiring this circular sent to them regularly will receive it without charge upon application.]

BANK EXAMINERS TO COOPERATE WITH BANK OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS.

The Comptroller of the Currency has just decided upon a change of practice which will be welcome to the banks under his supervision. For years many bank examiners have forwarded their reports of examinations directly to the comptroller's office without disclosing to the officers or directors anything relating to their contents. There is maintained in the office of the comptroller a division of reports, and here a large clerical force is employed in reading the reports of examiners and in the preparation of letters of criticism addressed to bank officers and directors. Every known subject of criticism, whether great or small, has in the past practice of the office been met with its own particular letter form or paragraph form appropriate to each case. Thousands of letters were thus addressed to banks, many of them covering trivial matters which could easily have been corrected while an examiner was making his examination or which perhaps were corrected before the office had had time to digest the reports and prepare letters calling attention to those things which were considered objectionable. The result of the old practice was an enormous amount of correspondence, some of it entirely useless and much of it annoying and irritating. A better system is now being inaugurated, which will result in reducing the work of the division of reports to a very small part of what it used to be. Some examiners have obtained good results by calling the attention of bank officials and directors to everything which they found subject to criticism, but many merely reported irregularities to the comptroller's office without any statement of what was done to correct such matters while the examiner was in the bank. It is the belief of the Comptroller of the Currency that a large percentage of the letters of criticism would be unnecessary if the examiners would take up personally with the officers and directors during the examination all matters requiring correction and have them corrected as fully as possible while they are in the bank. If full correction can not be made, the examiners are requested, if in their judgment it appears advisable, to secure and send with their reports a letter signed by the directors to the effect that they have been advised of the facts subject to criticism by the examiner and stating what has been or will be done to correct them. It is the wish of the comptroller that all minor matters be adjusted while the examiner is in the bank, thus making it unnecessary for his office to take them up by correspondence. The change is really a radical one and fundamental, inasmuch as it involves an almost complete change in the method to be pursued by an examiner in his intercourse with bank officials and directors. Hitherto it has rather been the general practice of examiners to refrain from discussing with bank officers anything which they intended to make the subject of criticism. This lack of cooperation has often resulted in misunderstandings between the comptroller's office and the banks, and, as stated, the causes of complaint have in many instances disappeared before the comptroller's letter of criticism has reached those for whom it was intended. The change will result in less work for the comptroller's force in Washington, less confusion and delay, and certainly less friction.

In the matter of closer supervision on the part of bank directors, the comptroller has decided upon the use of a form which some of the examiners now use for the purpose of having the directors advise his office that they have gone over the bills and notes, etc., with the examiners. Signatures of directors to this form are obtained by the examiner, and it is sent in with his report. The comptroller has recommended to all examiners who have not heretofore used this form to do so now. In substance, this form requires directors to advise the comptroller that they have, on the date the examination is made, examined all the bills and notes forming a part of the assets of their bank. They are required to declare that to the best of their knowledge and belief the signatures and indorsements on the same are genuine; that all collaterals pledged as security for any of the bills and notes are in the custody and control of the bank; that all the bills and notes are good and collectible, the exceptions to be stated if there are any; and that the excess-loan law has not been violated by accommodation notes or otherwise.

This form was prepared for use in the examination of banks in smaller cities and towns; its use in the larger city banks, so far as securing the signatures of the entire board is concerned, is probably impracticable, owing to the number of directors constituting such boards; but the comptroller has suggested that a certificate covering the same features be obtained, signed by the president or cashier of the bank and the discount or finance committee, or such other committee as is actively engaged in looking after the affairs of the bank. The recommendation that such a certificate be used in the smaller towns is put forward by the comptroller largely by the way of recommendation, and in the case of the larger city banks it is expected that the examiners will, if the method suggested appears to be impracticable, advise the comptroller fully with reference to the matter.

GOVERNMENT BOND SITUATION.

Contrary to expectations, there is a fair prospect that neither Panama bonds nor certificates of indebtedness will be issued by the Government in the immediate future. Certainly the Treasury is not any nearer the necessity for such an issue than it was a month ago. The available cash and the working balance have remained at substantially the same figures they were a month since, and both great sources of receipts, customs and internal revenue, are improving. From day to day ordinary receipts are slightly in excess of ordinary expenditures, and only the extraordinary outlay on account of the Panama Canal could be regarded as the occasion for a sale of bonds or certificates. The general fund in the Treasury is entitled on account of canal expenditures to reimbursement exceeding $105,000,000. Of this sum more than $22,000,000 has been spent during the eight months of the current fiscal year now passed.

The working balance in Treasury offices is roundly $19,000,000, but this does not include silver bullion, subsidiary coin, and minor coin, aggregating more than $25,000,000, and which, under the form of statement used by the Treasury prior to last summer, would have been regarded as a part of the working balance. If the old form were still in use, the working cash would appear as $44,000,000 instead of $19,000,000, shown by the new statement. A working balance of $44,000,000, even with more than one-half that sum made up of subsidiary silver, would have been regarded when the old statement was in vogue as sufficient for all immediate Treasury needs.

The depository banks also hold $35,000,000 public funds, and while it might be inconvenient for the Government to transact its enormous business of collecting and disbursing the revenues through these agencies without maintaining such a sum in the banks, still it is not doubted in well-informed quarters that for a while at least the Treasury could reduce the depository accounts materially.

It is well within the possibilities, therefore, that there will be no government issues offered to the public soon. This view of immediate Treasury necessities and prospects takes into consideration the fact that the corporation taxes will, unless the corporation excise-tax law be declared unconstitutional, add from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 to Treasury funds by July 1 next. If the Treasury shall succeed in warding off a sale of bonds or certificates during the remainder of this fiscal year, it may be able, with the aid of the corporation taxes and with general revenues increasing, to postpone the canal reimbursement still further. There are two principal reasons why it would be desirable to delay an issue of any kind. One is that it is politically inexpedient in the face of congressional elections, and the other that Congress has not, and probably will not, adjust the circulation tax in such manner as to guard against a decline below par of the present 2 per cent bonds, of which there are outstanding $731,000,000. The consequences of such a decline—most certain to follow an offer of new Panama bonds bearing a rate higher than 2 per cent—with circulation privileges equal to those enjoyed by the old twos, would not be favorable to the public credit. The good faith of the Government in thus discriminating against the holders of so large a part of the public debt would also be in question. Altogether this problem is so serious that it is doubtful if the Treasury will ever resort to the sale of Panama bonds while the circulation-tax features remain unadjusted and while it has the power to sell certificates of indebtedness, by means of which temporary financing could be made to care for Treasury needs pending the clearing of the whole government bond situation.

While the near future as to government bonds is somewhat clearer than it was a month or two ago, general conditions which affect the longer outlook are becoming more and more complicated. It is known that the Monetary Commission will, in the course of a year or two and perhaps earlier, be prepared to report some plan of currency reform which may involve the note-issuing powers of the national banks. These banks own more than $700,000,000 of the $913,000,000 interest-bearing debt. They hold the bonds under special inducement as to circulation privileges, and have suffered a loss of $30,000,000 in their premium accounts by reason of the depreciation in governments during the last two years. What will be done as to this vast holding in case the power to issue circulation is given over to a central institution? This is a question which vitally concerns the Government and the banks. Its answer has been attempted, in connection with the pending postal savings-bank legislation, by an amendment providing for the investment of postal savings deposits in United States bonds, thus making a market for securities bearing the low rate of 2 per cent. So much opposition from the country has developed because of the insistence that postal deposits be kept in the communities where they originate that it is thought the amendment will fail. Although it would undoubtedly be objectionable from other points of view, its passage would solve in great part a serious and vexing situation.

It has also been suggested that the only course open to the Government in case circulation privileges are ever withdrawn from the national banks will be to refund its debt at some investment rate. This would be a difficult thing to do, and, no mater how just, is beyond the courage of any political party. A still further suggestion, of much merit, is that in order to cure the situation which would arise from an issue of Panama bonds at a rate higher than the outstanding issues a law be enacted which shall provide that whenever United States bonds are used as a basis for national-bank circulation they shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, and when not so used they shall bear 3 per cent per annum. This suggestion would apply only to future issues, and would not apply to any bonds now outstanding except the 2 per cent issues. But adroit and efficient as might be this plan of safeguarding the old bonds and of providing a better investment rate in case they are not employed in circulation accounts, it fails to note that its adoption would open the way to still further increases in the volume of national-bank notes issued, a contingency which, in view of existing redundancy, would not be desirable at this time. Thus the government bond problems, now and to come, are involved and confusing.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the bill, and ask that the Secretary may read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

From and after the passage of this act the Comptroller of the Currency shall set apart the annual tax on the circulation of the national banking associations of the United States as a special fund, to be designated the "bank depositors' guaranty fund," to be used by the comptroller for the immediate payment of the depositors of any national bank failing after the passage of this act. The net liquidated assets of any national bank of which the Comptroller of the Currency takes charge for the purpose of liquidation shall be deposited to the credit of the bank depositors' guaranty fund to the extent required to reimburse such fund any moneys advanced by such fund for the payment of the depositors of such bank. No deposit under contract, either directly or indirectly, to bear interest in excess of 4 per cent per annum on time deposit or in excess of 2 per cent per annum on current account shall be included in the insurance provided by this act, and no such deposit shall be paid out of the bank depositors' guaranty fund.

SEC. 2. That any state bank or trust company may enter into a contract with the United States to have its deposits guaranteed by the bank depositors' guaranty fund upon equitable terms, to be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency and approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer this substitute for the following reasons: In my own State this policy has been, as I have heretofore set forth at some length in the Senate, tried and tested. It has served a good and useful purpose. It has brought from hiding a large hoard of money. The Oklahoma state banks in nineteen months increased from $18,000,000 of individual deposits to $49,775,000 of individual deposits. Several banks failed during that time—three national banks and three state banks. The national banks had no means with which to pay promptly their depositors. Unrest, disquiet, financial disturbance were the consequence of the failure of the national banks. But in the case of the failure of the state banks having a guaranty fund available, the depositors were promptly paid. The depositors who were paid redeposited their money in contiguous banks and no disturbance ensued.

I offer this plan as a substitute for the pending bill, because it will give to the depositors a larger rate of interest with equal security. I offer this substitute for the pending measure because it will accomplish everything that the pending measure can provide, and something more. It will take the Government out of the banking business; it will make unnecessary a large number of government employees who may otherwise be required; and I think that the less the Government does in the way of private business the better.

I have no hope, of course, that this proposal will be accepted; I have no hope that it will be even considered; but, nevertheless, believing as I do that it is far superior in every respect to the bill as it stands, I offer it, and must rest content to see it speedily die at the hands of a ruthless majority.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the amendment proposed as a substitute be laid on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to consume a very brief space to state in as concrete form as I can some of the objections that influence my judgment and will control my action in opposing this measure.

I object to the bill for the following reasons:

First. I find no constitutional warrant for such legislation, although I have followed its sponsors in their belated tortuous and labored explorations through all the realms of constitutional possibilities in search of a hook on which to hang this measure. Those who maintain that the measure is constitutional, after all their efforts at agreement, can not agree upon the clause of the Constitution upon which they predicate their contention. Some say constitutional sanction for the proposed law can be found in the clause empowering Congress to coin money, and in no other clause; others say it can be found in the clause empowering the Congress to establish post-offices, and in no other clause; others say it can be found in the clause empowering the Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, and in no other clause; others say it can be found in the clause empowering the Congress to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and in no other clause; while others, finding no specific power in the actual text of the Constitution, are driven to the extremity of saying that the power is conferred by the preamble to the Constitution. When those who assume the burden of finding constitutional authority for this novel legislation are so widely divided in opinion, it becomes manifest that whatever position they take is the result of a strained, far-fetched, and most uncertain interpretation. It is plain that those who uphold the constitutionality of the proposed enactment are themselves in doubt as to the soundness of the several and varying positions they assume. If that were not so, there would not be such a confusion of tongues among them. In this aspect of the case, so far from being shaken in my first impression that the Constitution confers no authority for this legislation, I am strengthened in it. The weakness of a divided opinion, disclosed by the advocates of the bill, gives greater confidence to those who primarily do not believe in any of their opinions.

Second. Personally I have never been much enamored of this kind of legislation. I have never believed that it is adapted to our institutions, governmental or industrial. It is too much of an interference by the Government with the personal and domestic affairs of the people and accentuates too strongly the rapid and lamentable trend toward paternalism and the centralization of power at Washington. I do not believe it to be within the constitutional province of the Government, and even if it were I do not believe it would be wise for the Government itself to enter into the business of banking, or manufacturing, or mining, or transportation, or farming, or any other business which ordinarily engages the activities of the people. It smacks too much of socialism or communism and is out of harmony with our established institutions.

Third. It is said to be a scheme to bring money out of hiding and to encourage thrift. Those are high-sounding terms, but they belong to the domain of theory and speculation. Our country, taken all in all, considering the extent of its territory and population, the character of its institutions and the very framework of its civilization, make it fundamentally and radically different from all other countries. No man can tell even approximately how much money would be brought from hiding by this measure. That must be purely speculative. But we can count with reasonable certainty that millions now held as savings in local institutions will be diverted to the custody of the Federal Government, and that ultimately it will leave the communities where it is earned and find its way into the Federal Treasury and into the great financial centers of the Nation. Establish this system and you will lay the corner stone for a great central bank, and a straight road will soon be built between the bank and the post-office. It would be far more apt to take unhidden money out of the communities where it belongs than to make money vaguely alleged to be hidden available to those communities.

It may be said that the Democratic party was pledged by its last national platform to a postal savings bank. That part of the Denver platform referring to a postal savings bank is as follows:

> We favor a postal savings bank if the guaranteed bank can not be secured, and believe that it should be so constituted as to keep the deposited money in the communities where the depositors live. But we condemn the policy of the Republican party in proposing postal savings banks under a plan of conduct by which they will aggregate the deposits of the rural communities and deposit the same while under government charge in the banks of Wall street, thus depleting the circulating medium of the producing regions and unjustly favoring the speculative markets.

This bill does not meet the requirements of that declaration. It may be said with reasonable certainty that the terms of this bill are such as to make it certain that the money deposited under its provisions will not be kept in the communities where the depositors live.

Fourth. It would put a tremendous and dangerous power in the hands of the managing board of trustees, and would entail an enormous expense, amounting to tens of millions, on the taxpayers.

There is no need, Mr. President, to multiply objections nor to amplify on those already made. What I have said is sufficient, and it so strongly appeals to my judgment that I can not bring myself to regard this measure with favor.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have taken no active part in the discussion of the general features of this bill. While I have had very pronounced convictions upon this subject, I have been content with the statement of reasons upon which those convictions have been based as they have been given by Senators with whom I am in accord in this opinion; and I shall trespass upon the time of the Senate but a very few minutes now for the purpose of suggesting to the Senate what must necessarily be the practical operations of the bill under the amendment which has been adopted, known as the Smoot amendment. Prior to the adoption of this amendment the bill required that money, when received under the law by the post-offices in the country, shall be deposited in the banks, state and national, in the communities where the money is received, and to make this entirely effective there was added the following:

> Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed, from time to time, by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2¼ per cent per annum.

But the amendment just adopted, and known as the Smoot amendment, strikes out all the foregoing and inserts the following in lieu thereof:

> Provided, That when, in the judgment of the President, war or any other exigency involving the credit of the Government so requires, the board of trustees may withdraw all or any part of said funds from the banks and invest the same in bonds or other securities of the United States.

That amendment has absolutely revolutionized this bill. It has not simply revolutionized it in the main feature, which has been so forcibly expressed during the last two days by various Senators, in the fact that it removes the money from the local and neighboring banks. That is a revolution in itself sufficient to require one to vote against it, but that is not the main revolution so far as regards the character of the bill. It has entirely changed the character of the bill and the relations of the Government to the money which is to be collected under this law.

As the bill was introduced in the Senate, and as it was up to the time of the adoption of this amendment, the money when collected would not be the money of the Government, it would be the money collected to be held in trust for the depositors. Even if the Government should have put it in its Treasury for safe-keeping, it would not have been the money of the Government. It could not have been converted into the Treasury. It could not have been made a part of the fund subject to the appropriations of Congress. It must necessarily, under the provisions of the bill as originally drawn, have been a trust fund to have been kept separate in the Treasury, or in the banks if it were deposited in the local banks, as was designed.

But, Mr. President, under this amendment, taking the feature of it which authorizes the purchase of bonds, the bonds must be purchased either from the Government itself or from those outside parties who hold bonds in their own right as their private property. Now, take one at a time. Let us see what is to be the practical operation of this bill. Suppose the Government elects to use the fund in exchanging it for its own bonds. Then the money received in exchange for the bonds of the Government does become the money of the Government. The money received at the post-offices is no longer a trust fund, but it is a general fund belonging to the Government to be covered into its Treasury and to be disposed of in any way that Congress may authorize, just like any other money in the Treasury.

Now, when the money received has been thus exchanged by the Government for its bonds, and when thus covered into the Treasury as the money of the Government, how is that to be disposed of? We are told that this fund is to amount to at least $500,000,000. How is it to be disposed of by the Government if the Government issues bonds and takes the money to itself and covers it into its Treasury? It can not be needed for the support of the Government.

We have the word of the President of the United States given in his recent address in New York—I think it was in that address, certainly if not in that in one of his recent addresses—that there is to be no deficit, but that under the operations of the laws as they now exist and being administered the prospect is certain and beyond doubt that the needed revenues of the Government are to be obtained from its ordinary sources.

So we are confronted with the proposition that the Government is to have in its Treasury $500,000,000, or as some think a thousand million dollars, with the question what to do with it, it not being needed for its ordinary disbursements. Is it to be allowed to remain idle in the Treasury? Can it be contemplated for a moment that any part of the people, official or private, would consent to $500,000,000 being locked up in the Treasury, in addition to the reserves which are now required for the gold reserve and otherwise?

Of course not, Mr. President. That is an utter impossibility. Then what else is to be done with it? As it can not be paid out for current expenses there is but one other thing that can be done with it, and that is to deposit it in the banks, not under the provisions of this law, deposited with uniform regularity in the state and national banks throughout the country, at least in proportion to the collections or deposits from the individual depositors, but deposited in the selected national banks under the present law just as deposits have been made for years past. It would be the Government's money; not money belonging to depositors throughout the country. It would not be money deposited under the postal savings-bank law, because, having been received by the Government in exchange for its bonds, it would no longer belong to the postal savings-bank fund, but it would be money deposited under the general law now on the statute book, under which a few years ago over $200,000,000 was deposited by the Government in the national banks of the country.

Mr. President, there is no escape from the three propositions: First, that the Government will not need this vast sum of five hundred millions or any part of it for its ordinary disbursements; second, that it must either keep it idle in the Treasury; or, third, deposit it in such national banks as may be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, under the present national banking law.

Mr. President, is that the object of this bill? Is it the object of the bill to collect this vast sum of money in order that there may be under the wide discretion that the Secretary of the Treasury now has as to the deposit of this money, the $500,000,000 or a thousand million dollars, as it may be, that it shall be deposited in the few favored, selected national banks at the discretion and will, and, if you please, the favoritism and the caprices of any Secretary of the Treasury who may hereafter hold office?

Mr. President, we have had illustrations in this country of the manner in which that discretion is sometimes exercised by Secretaries of the Treasury. Senators who have been so eloquent here in insisting that this bill should be so shaped that the money collected should be deposited in banks in the localities where it has been received in order that their communities might have the benefit of that money, are the Senators representing sections of the country which have heretofore been discriminated against by Secretaries of the Treasury in the exercise of that discretion, when they have deposited vast amounts in national banks in certain localities and left other localities famishing for currency.

Mr. President, I want to give an illustration of the manner in which that discretion is sometimes exercised. It is not new, but it is well to have the Senate reminded of it when we are about to vote, as it is evidently the purpose of almost the entire membership of this body representing the dominant party to vote to pass a bill which, according to the figures which they themselves have brought here, will deposit in the Treasury of the United States under the sale of bonds by the Government $500,000,000 or possibly twice that amount, as some Senators predict. It is well to have a recurrence to the experience we have had in the past as to how this deposit has been made.

Mr. President, one of the greatest scandals that I think has ever occurred in our governmental administration, or a thing which has given the basis for the greatest scandal, was the sale of the old custom-house in New York. It occurred about ten years ago, and was continued for seven or eight years thereafter. This scandal was caused by a matter of deposit, I will say; I am not speaking of something which is not relevant. Congress found it necessary to erect a new custom-house in New York, and therefore there naturally followed the necessity of selling the custom-house, which the Government then owned.

The custom-house was sold to the National City Bank, of New York, the same bank from which we have the suggestion that this legislation is to lead to the establishment of a central bank, and in that way relieve them of the $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds which the national banks now carry. It was sold to the National City Bank for $3,265,000.

Now, that was a very simple transaction if it had been carried out in the ordinary way, and if the $3,265,000 had been paid by the bank and deposited in the Treasury; but, under the discretion which the Secretary of the Treasury had to deposit money in the national banks, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] said the other day, in regard to the taking of bonds by the national banks and the issuance of currency on it and paying for the bonds with the currency, it was a mere matter of bookkeeping, and in the purchase of the New York custom-house no money was paid at all. It was arranged that the bank should undertake to pay $3,265,000 for this custom-house in New York, but that of this amount it should pay nominally in cash only $3,215,000, leaving $50,000 unpaid, for a reason which I will tell later. Out of that $50,000 alone thus remaining unpaid, and by leaving it thus unpaid, the National City Bank made something like $500,000, as I will relate.

The $3,215,000 was not paid into the Treasury of the United States, but it was nominally paid simply by the Secretary of the Treasury agreeing that it should be deposited with the bank, and the bank under this agreement simply credited the Government with $3,215,000 on its books, and kept the money as a deposit, paying no interest therefor for seven or eight long and fruitful years. The object in holding back $50,000 of it—and it was simply held back by not crediting that full amount on the books—was that the title should still remain in the Federal Government in order that it should not be liable to state or city taxation. In that way the National City Bank would escape the necessity of paying taxes to the State of New York and to the city of New York; and the new custom-house not being finished, just beginning to be erected, through seven or eight years, with this $3,215,000 not paid into the Treasury, but simply credited upon their books, and no interest paid upon it. The Government of the United States, if the published accounts are correct, then became the tenant of the National City Bank, and paid $125,000 rental a year for the building. The bank, under the deposit law, having simply upon its books a credit to the Government of $3,215,000, became the landlord of the United States and received from the United States $125,000 a year as a rental.

Mr. President, I said "if the published accounts are correct." I want to guard my words. I do not speak of my personal knowledge. These were the published accounts, and they have never been denied, so far as I have seen. I know nothing, so far as having had any examination of the books, of course. It can not be conceived, however, that these facts should be stated, that they should be published to the world, and that there should be no denial of them if they were not true.

Mr. President, taking this case as an illustration, what will the few selected national banks, like the National City Bank, receive under the present existing deposit law, which is the law under which this $500,000,000 would be deposited, if the Government took up the money of the people, through these postal savings banks and converted it into bonds? That is the proposition, as I think I shall demonstrate before I get through. All this talk about the particular kind of state banks or other banks where the money is going to be deposited under the terms of the postal savings-bank law means nothing. There is none going to be deposited in the banks of the localities under the terms of the postal savings-bank law. It is idle to expect it. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] offered an amendment that the money should all be invested in government bonds, which was without disguise; the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] offered an amendment which in practical operation means the same thing as the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, and nothing else, as I shall show; and I venture to say that the Senator from New York has failed to press his amendment and is supporting the amendment of the Senator from Utah because, in practical administration, it will mean exactly the same thing.

Returning, then, to this bank transaction. This bank, then, Mr. President, received $125,000 rental from the Government of the United States when it owed the Government $3,265,000, of which it had not paid a cent, and for the same property for which the rent was paid. It saved at least $500,000 in the seven or eight years in the way of taxes, if my information from the public press is correct, on this property, kept back from the city and State of New York by leaving the title to the property in the United States, through the device of the unpaid $50,000. There is another view that has been taken of it. The total amount received in rental, if the published accounts are correct, is about a million dollars—a million dollars paid by the Government of the United States upon its own property, nominally sold to the National City Bank, upon which the National City Bank had not paid a dollar, but under the deposit law had credited the amount on its books to the Government of the United States. It received about a million dollars in rentals, and, with the $500,000 saved in taxes, it amounted to a million and a half of dollars received by this bank without paying out a single dollar for it. If another calculation is made as to the amount that this $3,215,000 was worth to the bank in its ordinary business, it might be very much enlarged. Of course you can not count both the profits on the amount and also the rental, but you must take one or the other. But I shall not dwell on that. I simply bring that forward to illustrate the kind of discretion that this Government and the people of this country must rely upon, the kind of discretion that we as legislators must rely upon, or, at least, be in danger of, when it is proposed to take $500,000,000 and put it in the Treasury, where it must either lie idle or, under the present banking law, be subject to a discretion as to a deposit which can be exercised in the way I have illustrated by this concrete instance.

But, sir, I see the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] present. We all of us listened with great interest and were most profoundly impressed with his able and eloquent address on yesterday, when he graphically portrayed the dangers which there would be caused to this country by this large amount of money being in the banks, with the impossibility of collecting it promptly and immediately when the time of panic came. It is equally true that if the Government deposits the money in the national banks, it has got no money with which to pay these depositors, unless the banks will pay the deposits when demanded. It has taken bonds, which it has issued, and exchanged for the money, and it has deposited this money with the national banks; it has got its vaults choked with the bonds of the United States, held in trust for the depositors under the postal savings-bank law, but no money. A panic comes and the Government has to call upon the national banks for this $500,000,000, which it has received from the people and which it has exchanged for its bonds. Who believes the national banks will pay this vast deposit in time of panic. If not, what becomes of the credit of the Government when depositors demand their money and the Government can not pay?

It may be said, sir, that these deposits are to be made under existing law in the national banks, where the Government would be at a less risk than it would be if made in the banks such as were contemplated by the bill originally, scattered through the country, twenty-odd thousand of them; but, be that as it may, it is only a question of degree. Does any Senator here fail to remember that in the panic of a little over two years ago there were no banks in the United States whose doors were more closely locked than those of the great banks of the city of New York? Does any man fail to remember that the banks throughout the country which had their deposits in New York were unable to get their money in order that they might meet their obligations to their people at home, and carry on the business of their people at home? And when panic comes—and panics come suddenly; they come within a month or two—when panic comes, and the Government owes $500,000,000 to the depositors, and it calls on the national banks of New York or Philadelphia or Boston or elsewhere throughout the country, in greater or less degree, where this money is deposited, "Send in the money that we may pay these depositors," and the banks fail to respond, then where is the credit of the Government, for the maintenance of which the Senator from New York so eloquently urged us not to be unmindful?

In what way, Mr. President, except in the matter of degree, is the danger of the Government different under one proposition or the other? When the money is deposited in the banks in the country at large under the terms of the postal savings-bank law, there is a danger of the Government not being able to get the money which the Senator pointed out; but when the money is deposited—as it must be if the Government takes it up for its bonds—in the selected national banks where deposits are now made under existing law, the Government will also be confronted by the same danger. The experience of the recent past leaves us not a shadow of doubt that these national banks would also in time of panic fail to respond.

The Senator from New York said on yesterday that the panic of 1907 was stayed by the proposition that the Government would issue certain bonds and certain certificates which were known to represent cash. By that the Senator meant that the United States bonds could always be sold for cash. I have not had much personal experience in matters of that kind, but I am told by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], who is a practical banker, that in the panic of 1893—the Senator is here, and if I do not state him correctly, and I may not in detail, he can correct me, and I hope he will—in the panic of 1893, he then being engaged in the banking business, went to New York for the purpose of raising money, or for the purpose of getting money which he had on deposit with them, I believe it was—am I correct in that?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Alabama went to the bank for the purpose of getting money that they owed him, which he had on deposit with them, and which they refused to let him have, and in conversation with a prominent banker—I have forgotten his name, though the Senator stated it to me; he was one of the prominent bankers of New York—the Senator was told, as an illustration of the impossibility of that bank responding to his demand and paying him his money, that they had United States bonds which had been running on the market at one hundred and thirty and odd, and which could not then be realized upon at par. And that was then and in 1907 the experience of the banks throughout the South and West. The banks in New York had their money and locked the doors of their vaults and would not and could not pay it to them.

So, Mr. President, this does not get away from the danger which the Senator from New York so eloquently portrayed. If it be true that the money when deposited in the local banks throughout the country under the original purposes and terms of the bill would be in a position where the Government could not avail itself of it in time of panic and in the day of trouble, when it required it to pay the depositors, it is also true that there would be the same trouble if the Government buys bonds with the money received under the postal savings-bank law, puts the money in its Treasury, and then deposits it with the national banks under the present existing banking law. In time of panic the money could not be obtained from the national banks.

I do not forget, Mr. President, that the Senator said that we now have bonds immediately in prospect of issuance which would take up some $300,000,000 of this money; but if so, the money for which these bonds were exchanged would be spent by the Government for the purpose for which the bonds were authorized to be issued. Where would the money be found to pay the postal savings-bank depositors when payment is demanded. Shall the Government keep on hand $300,000,000 in cash for this purpose? If so, why issue the bonds to raise the money that is needed for expenditure by the Government? Again, we are not making this law for to-day or to-morrow. When this law is once passed, unless there should be some great convulsion, it stands on the books forever, and we are to enact this measure not with reference to what may be true to-day or to-morrow or next year, but what may be true in the next fifty years and beyond that. It is not to be anticipated that for all time we are to be in a condition where this large amount of money is to be absorbed by the issuance of bonds or that there will be a need to issue bonds. We have got to stand in face of the proposition and answer it. If the Government buys bonds with this money, what is to be done with the money? In what way can the Government keep the money, not only so that it shall be of the greatest benefit to the people, but so that the Government itself may maintain its credit and be in a position to promptly pay these deposits when the time of panic comes.

I respectfully suggest, Mr. President, and submit that the argument of the Senator from New York, if pressed to its logical and legitimate conclusion, is an argument also against the passage of the bill in this shape, under which bonds will be purchased and the money deposited with the national banks. It is simply a turning of the hand, but the same position is presented from either point of view. The danger is as great in the one case as in the other, if we can judge by experience.

Mr. President, there is another thing. The Government might not exchange its own bonds for this fund. If it did not, of course the particular trouble which I have suggested would not arise, but before we take the vote on this bill I would like for some Senator to point out in what way this $500,000,000 is to be cared for, and at the same time the Government protected against danger. If the policy is adopted that the Government exchanges the money reserved under the postal savings-bank law for its own bonds and there happens to be a time when it itself has not bonds to be issued for a specific purpose, like the building of the Panama Canal, what then? And how even if it has such bonds and makes the exchange, the Government will not have the cash on hand to repay to the depositors on demand the money it has received on deposit.

But suppose the Government does not do that, but that it sells the bonds to outsiders. It is true that there are now, under the amendment of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], not many bonds in which the money could be invested, because we have a bonded debt of less than a thousand million dollars, and almost all of it is in 2 per cent bonds. Our entire debt, I think, is less than a thousand million dollars. The 2 per cent bonds amount to some $700,000,000, and under the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho that the money can not be invested in bonds bearing less than 2¼ per cent, which has been adopted, none of the $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds could be used for that purpose. The Government could not invest in those bonds.

I have several suggestions to make in reply to that. In the first place, Mr. President, I want to know if there is any Senator here so credulous as to believe when this bill finally passes both Houses that these $700,000,000 of bonds are going to be excluded? Is there any Senator here so credulous as to believe that either in the other House or in the conference committee these $700,000,000 of bonds are not to be restored to this eligibility?

Mr. President, I speak of the President of the United States always with the greatest respect. I have ever done so, and I have served as a Senator when four different Presidents were in office. If there had ever been a time when I would more scrupulously guard my words, so as to not appear in any manner to unduly criticise the President of the United States, this is the time, because there has never been a President, I will say in all frankness, either of my party or opposed to my party, for whom I have had more personal regard than I have for the present occupant of that office; and what I shall say is not in the way of criticism. I am not fond of hearing references—I am not speaking now of the present, but at any time—to the opinions of the President of the United States—any President of the United States—in regard to legislation pending, because I think that is a matter that should be considered by Congress under its own responsibility; but this is a different case.

The function of Congress is to legislate. The function of the Executive is of another sort. Each should perform its function without invading the domain of the other.

We have adopted an amendment, in which we vest a certain discretion in the President of the United States; and, therefore, when we are considering the question whether the bill shall be passed or not, it is a perfectly legitimate consideration as to what is the attitude of the President of the United States in regard to this matter about which he is to exercise his discretion. The President of the United States recently made a speech, which ordinarily, possibly, I might not be justified in alluding to in this Chamber, but that speech has by formal vote of the Senate been published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and in addition it has been made a public Senate document, so that by every consideration it is entirely proper and in order to allude to the position of the President in this matter, not because his view should guide us in the matter of legislation, abstractly considered, but because we have in this bill vested in him by the amendment thus adopted a certain discretion in regard to this matter.

Now, what does the President of the United States think about this $700,000,000 in bonds? Does the President of the United States agree with the view expressed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, and which has been adopted by this body, that the $700,000,000 of bonds ought not to be a fund in which this money could be invested? Let me read you what he said, Mr. President. He is saying this now in anticipation of the passage of this bill; he is giving reasons why this bill should be passed in his speech in New York, which is published in the document I hold in my hand. I am reading from a Senate paper, and not from a newspaper. In giving the reasons why this bill should be passed, one of them is this:

> We have now about $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds with respect to which we owe a duty to the owners to see that those bonds may be taken care of without reduction below the par value thereof.

What does that mean, Mr. President? It means that, in the opinion of the President of the United States, this fund should be so utilized that in the demand which will be given on the market for these bonds by the investment of this fund the price of these bonds should be kept up. Does anybody doubt for a moment, with that view of the President of the United States, with the influence which we all know he is exerting on legislation, that this bill is going to be passed finally with the amendment of the Senator from Idaho incorporated in it? Is there a Senator, I repeat, so credulous as to believe for a moment, when this bill finally passes, the $700,000,000 of bonds can not be used as an investment for this fund?

Let us come to its consideration a little more closely. We have heard a great deal here about the effect that is going to be exerted upon the public credit of the Government by the disposition of this fund in time of war, in time of exigency. If the money is invested in the $700,000,000 of bonds, the Government has not the money any more; but it has the bonds thus purchased, held in trust for the depositors under the terms of the postal savings-bank law, and the banks have the money paid for their bonds. How are you going to realize on the bonds in time of panic? How are you going to get the $700,000,000? The money is not any longer in the control of the Government, either in its vaults or on deposit in the banks subject to its demand, and you have got in the place of that with which the Government is to protect its credit the $700,000,000 of bonds, which, according to the testimony of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], in time of panic can not, according to practical experience, be realized upon within 33 per cent of their value. The same thing would be true of an investment of the money in any other United States bonds which could be purchased from any private holders of the same, whatever might be their rate of interest. That is the practical operation of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another point, another practical question I want to suggest to Senators. I wish every Senator who within the past few days has thrilled us with his eloquence in portraying the iniquity of diverting this money from the localities where it was deposited in the post-offices and concentrating it in certain favored localities would consider this question that I am about to propound. Is there any man here so credulous as to believe that under the alternative, very mildly suggested by the Senator from Utah in his amendment, any money is going to be deposited in any local, state, or national banks under this bill? It may be deposited arbitrarily for safe-keeping here and there; but is there any man so credulous as to believe that with the adoption of this amendment and the passage of this bill, under this amendment, any money at any time is going to be deposited in the local savings banks or any other kind of local banks under the terms of this bill so that the money collected in the innumerable communities will remain in those communities?

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] says it will not remain. Of course I do not believe it will, even temporarily, and I will give my reasons for that in a moment. Who is to determine where it shall be put? The President of the United States. Talk about trustees! The President of the United States determines the whole thing. Does the President of the United States recognize these banks as a proper and a safe place to put money, this money, any money that the Government is to be responsible for? He has not left us in doubt about that. He is a very frank man, and in this Senate document, which is part of our records and of our files, we have the strongest condemnation that could be made of the policy, and a denunciation practically, of depositing the money according to the terms of this bill as it was originally drawn, or according to the terms as faintly contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Utah. In this speech, which, as I have said, is one of our documents and part of our files, the President of the United States says this, speaking of this bill:

> The great difficulty in the bill seems to have been to secure a proper provision for the management and investment of the money deposited.

Now, that is the broad proposition, and then, going on a little further, he says this:

> In the present stage of the Senate bill there have been inserted amendments drawn apparently for the purpose of having money deposited as savings in government post-offices distributed through the locality where deposited in the banks, state and national, and so deposited as to make it impossible for the trustees of the fund appointed under the law to withdraw the money for investment in any other form. I regard such an amendment as likely to defeat the law.

That was the first amendment of the Senator from Utah, which, when he offered it in the Senate, was supported with so much ardor and zeal and clearness of argument by him that it was adopted unanimously by the Senate, and which on his own motion has since been stricken from the bill. That quotation from the speech, left to itself, might not bring us to a definite conclusion as to the fixed view of the President as to depositing this money at any time, or even temporarily, in the banks; but upon the next page he makes the matter clearer. The first reason he gave in opposition to the amendments alluded to was that it endangered the constitutionality of the bill. Then he said, and I ask Senators to mark this language:

> Secondly, if the funds are to be arbitrarily deposited in all banks, state and national, without national supervision over the state banks, and a panic were to come, it is difficult to see how the Government could meet its obligations to its postal savings-bank depositors, because with every bank suspending payment the funds of the postal savings banks would be beyond the control of the Government, and we should have a financial disaster greater than any panic we have heretofore met.

Mr. President, there is the plain, candid, frank, unqualified avowal by the President of the United States that it would be a matter of great danger to deposit in these banks, as contemplated by this bill; that it would be a great danger to deposit even under the very slight and faint suggestion of such a deposit as is made in the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, which was adopted by the Senate.

Now, sir, we have had discussion here as to what would be the exigency, prescribed in the amended bill, under which the President of the United States would feel himself justified in withdrawing this money from local national and state banks, or in using it when it was first brought to hand through the post-office, and investing it in bonds. Various suggestions have been made. Need we go further than that? Evidently the President of the United States would regard the depositing of this money in the local banks generally throughout the country as so dangerous to the public credit that it would be equivalent to a continuing exigency authorizing him, nay, requiring him, to withhold the money from such local, state, and national banks and to invest it in the purchase of bonds.

With the discretion thus vested in him by the law, would the President be justified in the mind of any man or of the public, if he thought the danger was such as he portrays it, in depositing the money in the local, national, and state banks; and however safe we may think the local banks to be, it is evident the President does not think them safe, and can there be a question of the fact that this bill as it has now been amended and as we are now to vote upon it, when finally passed means the Root amendment and nothing else, and that there will be no deposit in the local banks of the country in the communities where the money shall be collected? I think the Root amendment is infinitely preferable to the Smoot amendment which has been adopted, because the Root amendment disguises nothing and misleads nobody, and in its adoption we would not deceive ourselves or mislead the public. The Smoot amendment means the Root amendment in its practical operation under what the President of the United States has said, and it means nothing else; but it is disguised in order that some Senators may be deluded, and that other Senators may deceive themselves against their own knowledge.

Mr. President, outside of the question of the constitutionality or the unconstitutionality of the bill, I presume there are few Senators who would not have been attracted to the support of the bill by the idea which has been made most prominent both in the public press and in public discussion, that this money was to be gathered up and put in a form where it would be of advantage to the communities from which it was gathered. But let no man deceive himself. I return to the original proposition, that this amendment absolutely revolutionizes the bill, and under the avowals, which I have quoted, of the President of the United States, who is to administer the law when enacted, the passage of this bill means that from every hamlet in this country, from every nook and corner of it, the money of the poor, the money of people making small earnings and engaged in small industries, is to be collected, carried away from those communities and, being invested in United States bonds, put into banks in the great money centers; and not only will it be withdrawn from the ordinary business of each community, but when a money famine comes, if it ever does, it will be more stringent in those communities than if this bill were not passed.

There is no trouble about money under our present per capita circulation, at least in ordinary times. It goes everywhere. It flows from every money center freely and comes back in the ordinary course of trade. But if panic comes—and that is what this bill, so far as concerns this feature of it, is sought to be adapted to—then it is that the extremities, the parts remote from the money centers, will be deprived of money. In the absence of this bill there would be, according to the most earnest and ardent advocates of it, money in the stockings and in the old tin cans to come out to relieve the difficulty in time of panic. But under this bill all that money would have been gone, and we would be in a worse condition than if the bill had not been passed, because that money, instead of being there to be brought out in time of dire necessity, if not for investment, at least for that which is necessary to life and comfort, would be a thousand miles away, locked up in vaults of the great national banks in the money centers, which it would be as impossible to open as it was impossible to open them two years and a half ago.

So far as there has been a popular demand for this legislation the people have asked for bread and you have given them a stone.

I wish to call attention to another matter. We speak about what is to be the final result in regard to this bill, what is to be the final shape of it; and I have alluded to the certainty, in my mind, that when this bill comes back it is going to be a very different bill from what it is; at least, when it comes back from the conference committee. And so far as the $700,000,000 are concerned, they are going to be eligible for this investment. If the Senators who have so eloquently portrayed the injustice and the iniquity of taking this money away from the people, and taking it away from their communities and investing it in bonds and concentrated in the money centers, have built a bridge upon which to cross back to the support of this bill in the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, requiring investment in bonds of not less than 2½ per cent, they will find that bridge broken beneath them and a chasm between them and justice to their people when this bill is finally passed.

If that is not so—I profess neither to be a prophet nor the son of a prophet—I will be more deceived than I ever was in the course of legislation. Not only that, this bill is not only going to come back to us and finally to be passed in a different shape, with this particular feature which I have spoken of at least set right, as right exists in the minds of some people, but the bill itself when it is passed will be but the beginning of things more serious.

Who thought when the savings-bank project was agitated that it had anything to do with the question of great fiscal operations, with the accumulation of $500,000,000 or a thousand million dollars to be afterwards used for other purposes? And yet, while the Senator from Montana most eloquently charmed us all in the beginning with the portrayal of the advantages which were to come to the individuals and to the small communities of the land in gathering up the hidden money and putting into the local banks for the local business and the local needs of each community, he has forgotten the song, and he sings now only of those things which will be of advantage to the great money centers and to the concentration of this money in a few localities, in the Treasury, if you please, though it is an impossibility that it should remain there; and if not in the Treasury, then, through deposits under existing law, in the favored selected national banks of the country.

But, Mr. President, as I have said, while we have progressed in this way and the horizon has been enlarged as to the purposes of this legislation, in my opinion it is but the beginning—even the passage of this bill—to subsequent legislation. And, sir, even if to save their faces, those who control this legislation should finally enact this law at this session and not change the provision which says that no bond shall be purchased bearing less than 2½ per cent interest, it will be only to postpone that change until another near-by session of Congress, possibly until after the $300,000,000 of bonds have been taken up to which the Senator from New York has referred, when another bill will be passed providing that the $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds may be purchased with these postal deposits. The President's statement about sustaining the value of these bonds necessarily commits him to that. The passage of this bill is but the beginning of serious matters.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] objected the other day to my use of the word "radical." There has been a most radical revolution in this bill, radical in the very point of view which I contemplated at the time I used the word, and when I called for the amendment which has since been introduced and adopted, in order that we might take time for its consideration—"radical," going to the root, converting the collection and custody and care of the money for the benefit of the people into things adapted for enterprises foreign to their interest and inimical to their interest.

I repeat, not only are we to have a development and progression as to this bill before we pass it, but when we pass it it will be but the beginning of a gigantic scheme such as has never been entertained or undertaken by the Government of the United States since the close of the civil war.

Mr. President, I have quoted from a document which contains a speech of the President of the United States, and I have not hesitated to speak of it as his speech, because we know it officially, not from the newspapers, but by having adopted it and made it a document, putting it in our RECORD; and I have read from the official document. Now, I have something else in my hand which is not official and which I do not attribute to the President of the United States. But I think we may safely say it is the programme of those who represent the influence which has brought this bill to its present stage and which intends to pass it.

In the Washington Post of March 1 there is an article entitled "Record of Taft's first year in the Presidency," in which there is a subheading, "What President Taft has accomplished." Second, another subheading, reading, "In addition to tariff revision President Taft named as paramount policies" the following, naming them. Then, "What President Taft will obtain from his legislative programme," naming them, the different bills. One would suppose Congress had nothing whatever to do with all these matters, although they all relate to legislation. Next,

"President Taft's measures which have struck snags and are threatened with destruction at this session." Then there is a list of them.

I repeat that I do not attribute this to the President; I will not even go to the extent of saying it was inspired by those who stand near to him. I make no reference whatever to it except as representing the policy and intentions of those who are supporting this legislation. I do not use the President's name in connection with it except as it appears in an article which mentions his name. I do not attribute it to him at all. I do not intend to indulge in any criticism of him at all, but I do attribute it and I do intend to criticise those who are pressing this legislation in the Senate and in the House, if you please, though I have no right to say anything about the House.

I think I could find other things in newspapers that would be strongly corroborative of this, but I refrain. I simply call attention to this. In speaking of the postal savings-bank bill, it being one of the enumerated bills which it is said in this list will be passed, there is found this language:

> A postal savings-bank bill, but unsatisfactory, and constituting merely the entering wedge.

As a safety-deposit system, which will give to everybody an opportunity to put his little mite in a savings bank, it is not unsatisfactory. Nobody can presume for a moment it had any reference to that feature, because every man who has a dollar or a multiple of a dollar up to one hundred a month could put it in, and ultimately, I think, up to $500. There is no criticism upon that. There is nothing unsatisfactory in that. So there must be other features of the bill which are unsatisfactory.

Now, what are they? And of what is it the entering wedge? I will not repeat what I have already said about changes that are to be made in the bill, but when the bill has been passed, and when the $500,000,000 have been collected, and when annually thereafter the $100,000,000 are collected, there is going to come up the question the Senator from Oklahoma has mentioned; there is going to come up the question to which the president of the National City Bank has given utterance, as to the necessity of a great central bank to take care of money that the Government can not afford to keep idle in its vaults; that the Government, under the present law, can not put on deposit in the banks and trust to its ability to get it back from the banks when panic comes; and, therefore, we must have a great central bank in which to deposit it. And there must be the fund of $500,000,000 and more with which to purchase the $700,000,000 of 2 per cent United States bonds now held by the national banks, so that the Government may pass to the system of the great central bank—a system furnishing the greatest opportunity for graft and spoil and political corruption—a system full of menace to our freedom and to the preservation and purity of our political institutions.

I should like to know who told the president of the National City Bank that the probability was that the postal savings deposit bill was going to be so changed as to make the $700,000,000 of 2 per cent bonds available. It was not in the bill at the time he gave out the interview. There was not anything of that kind in the bill at the time the interview was given out. Some one who was in the secret must have told him before it was disclosed in the Senate. There is a great deal that may be surmised as to the negotiations which are going on, the advice which is being given, the information which is being transmitted, the suggestions as to shaping this legislation that these great financial institutions may adapt themselves to the proposed change in our banking system or that their gigantic schemes may be successfully accomplished through congressional legislation.

Now, again disclaiming that the President of the United States is responsible for this and not meaning to attribute it to him in any manner, but simply attributing it to those who are supporting this legislation, I will read another sentence. There are some Senators here who will appreciate it. Speaking of the postal savings-bank bill, it says:

> The postal savings-bank bill will pass the Senate in a form entirely unsatisfactory to western Senators, and may meet fierce opposition in the House.

Now, here is the point:

> The President will be satisfied to have it go through in any form, believing that amendments can be obtained in the future to make it more complete and effective.

I do not attribute that to the President, I say; but that is evidently the purpose of those who have it in charge and those who are pressing it to its final conclusion.

Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate further. I simply wished to point out practically what is to be the operation under this bill—that with the money devoted to the purchase of bonds, putting it in the Treasury, it must either lie idle or be deposited in selected national banks under the present banking law; and if it is used for the purchase of outside bonds, it in no manner effects any governmental purpose, but leaves the Goverment with only bonds to hold for the postal depositors and with no money to pay them either in the Treasury of the United States or on deposit, even, with the banks.

In either of these cases the selected national banks and the bondholders get the benefits and the Government bears the risks. On the other hand, when the money is deposited, as it should be, in the local banks, where it is received, the people of the community get the benefits and the Government runs no greater risks.

Sir, whatever may have been the view of Senators who believe it to be constitutional or unconstitutional it certainly is not for those of us who believe that the people should have the advantage of the money which they themselves have earned, and which they are to put in the post-office depositories—that they are to have the advantage of it in the stimulation of commerce and trade in their communities—to give our support to the bill. Let Senators who believe that it is right to go to every crossroads and every hamlet in this country and gather that money and bring it to a great center and either invest it in the bonds of the Government, so that the money will lie idle in the Treasury, or deposit it in the great selected and favored national banking institutions, give this bill their vote upon its passage, and then let them go to their people and read to them the speeches which within twenty-four hours they have made in this Chamber denouncing this very thing. Those of us who believe that if money is collected from the people it should be kept in the communities where it was collected, that they should have the benefit of it in their commerce and trade, and that it should not be carried away and concentrated in the great money centers, will vote against it.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter on any further discussion of the bill. I desire the attention of the Senator from Montana, in charge of this bill. What, in the Senator's opinion, is to be the status of the certificate of deposit with reference to taxation? Does he understand that such certificate will so fall under the operation of existing law as to be exempt from all taxation, national, state, and local?

Mr. CARTER. I presume the Senator from Indiana refers to the deposits made in the post-offices?

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; the certificate of deposit issued to the citizen who carries his money to the post-office.

Mr. CARTER. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Texas and others who have expressed the view that this deposit in the hands of the United States would not be subject to taxation. That is my opinion.

Mr. BAILEY. On page 5, line 12, I move to strike out the three words "after complying with" and to insert in lieu of them the four words "upon demand and under," so it will read:

> That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with accrued interest, upon demand and under such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Mr. CARTER. I have no objection to the amendment, and I can see none.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not believe the Government ought to make itself the recipient of these deposits at all. I believe, if the Government wants to teach the people anything that is useful, it would infinitely better teach them to use what they have saved than to teach them to save what they have made. But certainly, if the Government is going to receive the people's money at all, it ought to return it to them on demand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BAILEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). As previously announced by me, upon all amendments and upon the passage of the bill, I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, he requested me to say, he would vote "yea." If he were present and I were free to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and, out of deference to it, I have refrained from voting on any of the amendments. But I have been released by him to the extent, at least, that I may vote on the passage of the bill, and I vote "nay."

Mr. KEAN (when the name of Mr. BRIGGS was called). My colleague is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. BRISTOW's name was called). The junior Senator from Kansas is detained at his home in this city on account of sickness. If he were present, he has authorized me to state that, in its present condition, he would vote for the bill.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I am authorized to say that if he were present he would vote "yea," and I would vote "nay."

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). My colleague is paired on these questions with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON.] If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. TAYLOR (when Mr. FRAZIER's name was called). My colleague is paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE (when Mr. HALE's name was called). My colleague is detained from the Chamber. He is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If both were present my colleague would vote "yea," and the Senator from Virginia would vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. NELSON's name was called). My colleague is absent presiding as chairman over a joint committee of investigation. He is paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a statement and explanation of the vote I am about to give.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am opposed to this bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senate object? There is no objection. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill because, in my judgment, it is unconstitutional, even with the Smoot amendment, which I regard as——

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. KEAN. Nothing is in order except the calling of the roll.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true.

Mr. OVERMAN. Unanimous consent was given, Mr. President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless unanimous consent is not only given, but continued, the roll call will have to proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. It is not competent to grant unanimous consent and then withdraw it. The Chair distinctly put the request for unanimous consent to the Senate, and no Senator objected. Then the Senator from North Carolina proceeded with his statement.

Mr. LODGE. Two Senators rose at once.

Mr. BAILEY. Did they rise to object?

Mr. LODGE. They rose to object.

Mr. BAILEY. When the Chair put the question?

Mr. LODGE. They did.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me state how it was. The Chair asked for unanimous consent, and it was given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will correct the Senator. The question put by the Chair was whether there was any objection; the question was not as to whether there was unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. That is simply stating the same question in a different form.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is any objection I will not insist on proceeding and will vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can not, unfortunately, I am sorry to say, interrupt a roll call even by a request that unanimous consent be given. That has been decided heretofore.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. KEAN and others. Regular order!

Mr. OVERMAN. I will not insist upon it if there is any objection. I vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is paired on this question with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. My colleague is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BURROWS (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is detained by sickness from being present. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. ELKINS] is unavoidably absent from the city to-day. If he were present, he would vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. FLINT. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted; but in order that the RECORD may be made clear on the question of pairs, I will again state that I have transferred the general pair that I have with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER].

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—50.

Beveridge	Clapp	Flint	Page
Borah	Clark, Wyo.	Frye	Perkins
Bourne	Crane	Gallinger	Piles
Bradley	Crawford	Gamble	Root
Brandegee	Cullom	Guggenheim	Scott
Brown	Cummins	Heyburn	Smoot
Bulkeley	Curtis	Jones	Stephenson
Burkett	Depew	Kean	Sutherland
Burnham	Dick	La Follette	Warner
Burrows	Dillingham	Lodge	Warren
Burton	Dixon	McCumber	Wetmore
Carter	Dolliver	Nixon
Chamberlain	du Pont	Oliver

NAYS—22.

Bailey	Hughes	Paynter	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Johnston	Purcell	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	McEnery	Rayner	Taliaferro
Davis	Money	Shively	Taylor
Foster	Overman	Simmons
Gore	Owen	Smith, Md.

NOT VOTING—19.

Aldrich	Culberson	Hale	Penrose
Bacon	Daniel	Lorimer	Richardson
Briggs	Elkins	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Fletcher	Nelson	Tillman
Clay	Frazier	Newlands

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BACON. In view of the importance of this measure, as there were a great many pairs, I ask that the Secretary be instructed to tabulate the pairs, to be inserted at the end of the announcement of the vote, in order that it may appear in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

The list of pairs is as follows:

Mr. ALDRICH with Mr. BACON.
Mr. BRIGGS with Mr. DANIEL.
Mr. HALE with Mr. MARTIN.
Mr. LORIMER with Mr. TILLMAN.
Mr. NELSON with Mr. FLETCHER.
Mr. PENROSE with Mr. CLAY.
Mr. RICHARDSON with Mr. CULBERSON.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan with Mr. FRAZIER.

Mr. KEAN. I desire to have read from the standing rule of the Senate the first clause of Rule XII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the first clause of the rule, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XII.

VOTING, ETC.

1. When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may for sufficient reasons, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor shall the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No unanimous consent can interrupt a roll call except for a change of a vote.

Mr. KEAN. That is the rule.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is a rule which has not always been adhered to.

Mr. KEAN. I have never known it to be waived in my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. DRAPER, and Mr. RICHARDSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PARKER, Mr. TIRRELL, and Mr. REID managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6935. An act for the relief of the Merchants' National Bank, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.;

H. R. 9447. An act for the relief of J. A. Denny;

H. R. 11821. An act for the relief of John H. McBrayer;

H. R. 14729. An act for the relief of Capt. Evan M. Johnson, U. S. Army;

H. R. 18249. An act for the relief of the estate of John H. Fitzhugh, deceased; and

H. R. 18563. An act for the relief of the Bank of Freeburg, Freeburg, Mo.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4639. An act concerning tonnage duties on vessels entering otherwise than by sea;

S. 5697. An act to authorize the change of name of the steamers A. B. Wolvin and Cambria, owned by the Port Huron and Duluth Steamship Company; and

H. R. 13410. An act to modify the One Hundred and twenty-second and One hundred and twenty-fourth Articles of War and to repeal the One hundred and twenty-third Article of War.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented a memorial of the National Association of Live Stock Dealers and Shippers, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Danbury, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called "eight-hour bill," which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Faith Trumbull Chapter of the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Norwich, Conn., praying for the retention and strengthening of the Division of Information of the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization in the Department of Commerce and Labor, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of Local Council No. 91, Loyal Association, of New Britain, Conn., and a petition of Yale Council, No. 117, Loyal Association, of New Haven, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the admission of publications of fraternal societies to the mails as second-class matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HEYBURN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Atlanta, Idaho, praying for the passage of the so-called "eight-hour bill," which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 6937) granting an increase of pension to George Edward Butler; and

A bill (S. 6938) granting an increase of pension to Charles Dupre; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PAYNTER:

A bill (S. 6939) for the relief of the estate of W. R. Decker, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OWEN:

(By request.) A bill (S. 6940) to compensate the Delaware Indians for services rendered by them to the United States in various wars; and

A bill (S. 6941) for the relief of the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. HEYBURN:

A bill (S. 6942) constituting Eastport, Idaho, a subport of entry in the customs collection district of Montana and Idaho, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 6943) granting an increase of pension to Joseph A. Brinton; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment relative to the acceptance and ratification of the agreement submitted by the Shoshones, Bannocks, and Sheepeaters of the Fort Hall and Lemhi Indian Reservation, in Idaho, May 14, 1880, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment proposing certain relief to homestead settlers under the act of February 20, 1904, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. KEAN submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for improving Keyport Harbor, Matawan Creek, Raritan, South, and Elizabeth rivers, New Jersey, to $150,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAYNTER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for improving the Kentucky River, Kentucky, to $206,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment relative to the survey of New Haven Harbor, Connecticut, by way of Oyster Point, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

WATER-POWER SITES.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I submit a resolution and ask that it lie on the table subject to call.

There being no objection, the resolution, S. Res. 195, was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Senate resolution 195.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee to consist of five Senators, whose duty it shall be to consider the question of the improvement of the navigable rivers of the United States with a view of recommending necessary legislation for the preservation of water-power sites and the coordination of navigation and power where available power sites exist on navigable rivers, and report the result of such investigation, with their recommendations, to the Senate by bill or otherwise. The committee shall have power to employ a stenographer at not exceeding $6 per day.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 6935. An act for the relief of the Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; and

H. R. 9447. An act for the relief of J. A. Denny.

H. R. 11821. An act for the relief of John H. McBrayer was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

H. R. 14729. An act for the relief of Capt. Evan M. Johnson, U. S. Army; and

H. R. 18249. An act for the relief of the estate of John H. Fitzhugh, deceased.

H. R. 18563. An act for the relief of the Bank of Freeburg, of Freeburg, Mo., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

SERVICE OF GRAND JURIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. DEPEW. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a conference, and that the conferees be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. DEPEW, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. BACON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW COAL LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. February 28 the Vice-President laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, published as Senate Document No. 390, and accompanying that report were certain illustrations which were not ordered to be printed. I move that the illustrations be printed with the document.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to know what the illustrations are.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a message from the President of the United States transmitting reports rendered in connection with the investigation to determine the extent and value of coal deposits in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in Oklahoma, and of course under the printing law no illustrations can be printed without an order of the House or of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection to that. I had a faint hope that it was some illustration of how Senators on the other side could change their opinion and votes.

Mr. SMOOT. If that had been the case, I would not have made the request so soon.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the illustrations accompanying Senate Document No. 390, Sixty-first Congress, second session, entitled "Message from the President of the United States, transmitting reports rendered in connection with the investigation to determine the extent and value of the coal deposit in and under the segregated coal lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in Oklahoma," be printed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to give notice that on Monday, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 7, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 5, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 19403) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. DRAPER, and Mr. RICHARDSON.

AMENDING SECTION 810 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PARKER, Mr. TIRRELL, and Mr. REID.

PRESERVATION OF THE FILES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 677) from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 403.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, under the direction of the Clerk, an amount not exceeding $2,500 for the better preservation of the early files of the House, consisting of original manuscripts; said files to be classified, relacketed, and indorsed in such manner as in the judgment of the Clerk will insure their safe-keeping and accessibility.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Add at the end of the resolution the following: "And the Clerk is hereby authorized and directed to deposit all original letters and papers of historical value with the Librarian of Congress for preservation in the Library of Congress as a part of the files of the House of Representatives, subject to removal or withdrawal only by order of the House, a list of same and receipt therefor to be communicated to the House and published in the Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to ask the gentleman to give the House some idea as to the character of these documents which it is proposed to have printed and preserved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve a point of order on the report.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the Clerk read the report.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts can state what the proposition is.

Mr. O'CONNELL. The proposition, briefly, is that the early files of Congress are in a decaying condition, as illustrated by these papers [exhibiting a bundle of papers]. They are all in this deplorable condition. They are covered with dirt because of their exposed location and are yellow with age; on many of the wrappers the backing is illegible.

These files contain very many important papers. For instance, here is an original letter from Mrs. Abraham Lincoln, asking that a pension be granted to her. It was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions in 1869.

Another letter is from Lafayette, urging the appointment of Colonel Harrison to the Supreme Court, which is indorsed by President Monroe.

Another letter is from Martha Washington, relative to the disposition of the body of her illustrious husband. Also a letter from President Washington himself, urging Col. Robert Hanson Harrison to accept an appointment as associate justice of the Supreme Court, and other letters of Washington upon that and other subjects. Still other letters I might mention are from such men as Jefferson, Madison, John Jay, Tom Paine, and David, the French sculptor who executed the original bust of Washington, presented to the United States by France, and which was destroyed some years ago when the old Library of Congress was partially burnt, a replica of which is now in the Rotunda. These papers were once classified according to Congresses, but, as I said, time and dust have rendered their condition a subject for their better preservation and reclassification. It would be difficult to determine their exact contents or to refer to a particular paper, and they are liable to be removed from the files without detection. It seems to me that they are treasures that the House should protect.

The resolution asks that these papers in this condition may be refiled, rejacketed, and so protected by the Clerk that they will serve educational and historical purposes; that the more valuable papers may be sent to the Librarian of Congress and kept by him in such shape as are other important documents now deposited there, such as the State Department collection of valuable state papers, so that they may not be stolen, mislaid, or misplaced.

Mr. MANN. Who determines the historical value of these documents?

Mr. O'CONNELL. I presume the Clerk of this House and those that assist him.

Mr. MANN. I should think that that matter, if it is to be done at all, had better be done by people in the Library of Congress who are able to form a judgment as to the historical value of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think everybody would agree that that is an impeachment of the House and the present management.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I hardly think that criticism just, if it is made seriously, for these papers have been stored in their present location upstairs under the roof for at least a quarter of a century, and have there remained throughout many administrations in this House. On the other hand, I think it commendable in the present officials to call our attention to the matter, that some proper action might be taken. It is a condition the responsibility for which can not justly be attached to anybody. I recall that for many years the late Walter H. French, of Boston, a familiar figure to many of the older Members of the House, was the custodian of the file room, and that during his incumbency many methods were adopted for the better keeping of the archives. Colonel French was raised in an atmosphere where such valuable historical documents are appreciated, and he was zealous in their preservation to the extent of the facilities at his command. It was he, I am told, who prevented possible depredations upon these very papers now under discussion by the erection of iron screens, but this precaution could not prevent further damage from exposure. It seems to me that almost any man connected with the House of Representatives would be able to determine the historical value of these papers. Let me read a letter of Mrs. Lincoln to the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is as follows:

To the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: I herewith most respectfully present to the honorable House of Representatives an application for a pension. I am a widow of a President of the United States whose life was sacrificed in his country's service. That sad calamity has very greatly impaired my health, and by the advice of my physician, I have come over to Germany to try the mineral waters, and during the winter to go to Italy. But my financial means do not permit me to take advantage of the urgent advice given me, nor can I live in a style becoming the widow of the Chief Magistrate of a great Nation, although I live as economically as I possibly can. In consideration of the great services my dearly beloved husband has rendered to the United States, and of the fearful loss I have sustained by his untimely death, his martyrdom, I may say, I respectfully submit to your honorable body this petition, hoping that a yearly pension may be granted me, so that I may have less pecuniary care.

I remain,

Most respectfully, MRS. A. LINCOLN.

FRANKFORT, GERMANY.

This was received January 26, 1869, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions by the Speaker and was found among the files and papers unprotected and gradually falling to pieces.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How many people are to be employed in going over these old files?

Mr. O'CONNELL. The Clerk says he can do it with the sum of $2,500, and do it before the next Congress comes in.

Mr. MANN. How late down, historically, do they come with this investigation?

Mr. O'CONNELL. To about the Forty-first Congress. Of course a good many of the files were destroyed when the British partially destroyed the old Hall of the House in 1814.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the committee amendment is a subject upon which all the Members of the House should be agreed. As to the disposition of the appropriation that, perhaps, is a question which the Committee on Accounts can best advise us upon, and I think the gentleman from Illinois has put a very pertinent question to the gentleman from Massachusetts as to who are to make the selection of the documents which are of importance historically to Congress. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he will not accept an amendment providing that the selection of these papers for the use of the Library of Congress shall be made under the direction of the Chief of the Bureau of Manuscripts of the Library of Congress?

Mr. O'CONNELL. I do not know why he should do it any more than the Committee on the Library of the House, which has jurisdiction of the subject. I am told by a former assistant file clerk—Mr. Page, now clerk of the Committee on Accounts—that he brought this matter informally to the attention of the Joint Committee on the Library a few years ago.

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman has ever investigated that department of the Library of Congress he will find that the Chief of the Bureau of Manuscripts is actively engaged in obtaining and in preserving the original documents connected with our history in the nature of those from which the gentleman has just read, and he is the person best qualified in our Government to determine which are and which are not valuable among these old files.

Mr. O'CONNELL. If the gentleman will put his amendment in writing so it can be understood, I do not believe there will be any objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I will state the amendment orally and ask the Clerk to put it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman to state, according to this resolution, by whom is this work to be done.

Mr. O'CONNELL. It is to be done under the supervision of the Clerk of this House.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It does not necessarily mean that the Clerk himself is to do the work?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. He can of course employ or call upon the proper officers of the Library of Congress to assist him in this work.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Well, the Clerk has competent and qualified assistants and custodians who are more familiar with these things than anybody else.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. If it became necessary to decide as to the historical value of any particular document there would be nothing to prevent the Clerk from calling upon the library officials or anybody else?

Mr. O'CONNELL. It seems to me that it would be very simple for him to have a conference with the Librarian of Congress as to the value of any particular paper.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The Clerk when before the committee stated there were certain men who were experts in the business of looking over old papers and people who were familiar with the value of these old letters and things of that kind and that he expected to employ people who were expert in that business. It was not a proposition for the purpose of giving any money to anybody employed in the Clerk's office, but that they might employ outside of the Clerk's office people who were familiar with what was proposed to be done.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I will ask whether the gentleman or the Committee on Accounts had before it the provisions of the statute found in Thirty-first Statutes at Large, page 642, which provides:

> The Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to deliver to the Librarian of Congress all bound volumes of original papers, general petitions, printed matter, books, and manuscripts now in or that may hereafter come into the files of the House, which, in his judgment, are not required to be retained in the immediate custody of the file clerk; and it shall be the duty of the Librarian of Congress to cause all such matter so delivered to him to be properly classified, by Congress, and arranged for preservation and ready reference. All of such matter to be held as a part of the files of the House of Representatives, subject to its orders and rules.

And whether, if that committee did have that statute before it, it now intends by resolution of the House to repeal the statute or to amend it?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that the statute which he read refers to a lot of bound volumes, and that that order has already been executed. It does not refer to historical papers or papers such as these are that have such interest to the whole Nation, which, in the judgment of the Clerk, did not come within the purview of that act, and which were not intended should go out of his immediate custody without some such specific action as is now proposed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. It refers to bound volumes or original papers—

> Also books and manuscripts now in or that may hereafter come into * * * the custody of the file clerk.

Mr. O'CONNELL. That refers to manuscripts and general petitions, it is true, but it would hardly refer to these kinds of letters and communications.

The purpose of that act was to make room by removing bulky matter to make space for current and future files. It seems to me absolutely necessary that we should pass some such resolution as that now before use, because nothing has been done in pursuance of the statute which the gentleman has read to protect this kind of document. If the statute to which the gentleman refers did not cover these things, are we going to leave them still in the condition they are for age to ruin them?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the statute read by the gentleman from Illinois was considered by the committee?

Mr. O'CONNELL. The Clerk of the House came before us and told us he felt he had no right to send out of this building any of the very early files except such as had been preserved in bound volumes; that his authority did not extend to papers of this nature. The matter transferred to the Library of Congress pursuant to that act was, I believe, afterwards stored in the House Office Building, indicating that the main purpose of the law was simply to provide for its storage, and not to serve an educational or historical purpose, as is now our object.

Mr. NORRIS. Was this law called to his attention or to the attention of the committee?

Mr. O'CONNELL. We knew about the law, but it did not cover the ground covered by the pending resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that this law applies to the condition that is now before us.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I print as a part of my remarks the following report:

[House Report No. 677. Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

BETTER PRESERVATION OF EARLY FILES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. O'CONNELL, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following report to accompany House resolution No. 403.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 403, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption with the following amendment, viz:

At the end of the resolution insert:

"And the Clerk is hereby authorized and directed to deposit all original letters and papers of historical value with the Librarian of Congress for preservation in the Library of Congress as a part of the files of the House of Representatives, subject to removal or withdrawal only by order of the House, a list of same and receipt therefor to be communicated to the House and published in the Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

The resolution authorizes payment out of the contingent fund of the House, under the direction of the Clerk, of an amount not exceeding $2,500 for the better preservation of the early files of the House, consisting of original manuscripts; said files to be classified, rejacketed, and indorsed in such manner as in the judgment of the Clerk will insure their safe-keeping and accessibility.

The manuscripts referred to are stored in the space under the roof over the west stairway leading to the gallery of the House. About twenty-five years ago iron shelves were placed there to accommodate them, at which time they were removed from the file room proper to make space for the then current and the future files. The wrappers which inclosed them were even then yellow with age and the indorsements only faintly legible, and since then exposure to extremes of cold and heat and the accumulation of dust has caused the strings which bind the bundles to rot, the paper to tear and crack, and the backing to become almost obliterated.

The roof of the House is reached through the file room, where these manuscripts are kept, and at one point the passageway is barely wide enough to admit one person. Along this narrow way on one side are piled from the floor to the roof hundreds of bundles of the early records of the House, neglected and decaying. A more unfit place could not be found. Their early removal to a place of safety and their preservation and identification is demanded by considerations of pride and sentiment, if not alone upon the ground of historical value. The Clerk of the House stated that the work can be done within four or five months by the expenditure of $2,500, the amount named in the resolution.

The files of the House for the first twenty years of our national history are incomplete, the rarest and most valuable manuscripts having been destroyed by the fire of 1814, when the old House wing of the Capitol was partially destroyed by the British. Prior to the Seventh Congress files few papers were saved. The original messages and papers of President Jefferson and of later Presidents and reports of their Cabinet officers are preserved in bound volumes. These a few years ago were deposited in the Library of Congress and recently transferred to the House Office Building.

The manuscripts which it is now proposed to safeguard consist of original bills known as desk copies, with the action of the House indicated thereon, and the original amendments thereto; original letters accompanying bills and petitions, many of them written by distinguished persons; original memorials of state and territorial legislatures, petitions, reports of committees and accompanying papers, etc., covering a variety of subjects, and in themselves furnishing a documentary history of some of the most important events in our history.

It was related by a file clerk, now deceased, for many years a faithful employee, that the letter of Mrs. Martha Washington to the Congress concerning the removal of the remains of her distinguished husband from the crypt in the Capitol to Mount Vernon was stolen from a bound volume of original documents, but was afterwards returned. The volume from which it was taken was filed where the manuscripts under discussion are now filed.

These early files are frequently consulted by historians, under proper regulations, and, as showing their material as well as sentimental value, it is related by a former assistant custodian that a decision in a prominent lawsuit in a local court turned upon certain evidence found in the files of the House of an early Congress embodied in petitions of citizens of Alexandria, before recession, concerning the appointment of justices of the peace. Private claims growing out of the war of the Revolution, the war of 1812, Indian wars, and the war with Mexico, in themselves of no particular interest historically, have been found to be accompanied by letters of distinguished persons. Thus, for instance, in the claim of one Jones, heir at law of Col. Robert Hanson Harrison, of the Continental Line, were found holograph letters to Colonel Harrison from George Washington.

These letters tendered to and urged the appointment of Colonel Harrison as an associate justice on the first Supreme Court bench; one mentioned Washington's feelings of gratitude at the capitulation of Cornwallis; and other letters from Jefferson, Lafayette, Jay, Monroe, and others complete the evidence in the case. Still other letters of Washington and of his contemporaries are scattered through the archives. A few of them were exhibited to your committee and were found to be in such condition as to make their further preservation by a process now used immediately necessary. Moreover, we believe some of these manuscripts to be of such rare historical value as to call for their care and preservation in the Library of Congress along with other valuable collections deposited there. The State Department adopted this method of preserving historical state papers. That splendid edifice is preeminently the proper depository for such priceless literature.

Your committee therefore recommend an amendment authorizing and directing the Clerk to deposit all original letters and papers of historical value with the Librarian of Congress, subject to removal or withdrawal from the Library only by order of the House, and a list of same to be published in the Journal and in the RECORD. Such manuscripts could be designated as the "House of Representatives collection" and always remain a part of the files of the House.

Feeling that it would be a national reproach to allow the early files longer to remain in their present exposed location and neglected condition, your committee report favorably the accompanying resolution and amendment, and ask that the House agree thereto.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee which is now on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment and then report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Add at the end of the resolution:

"And the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to deposit with the Librarian of Congress all original letters and papers of historical value for preservation in the Library of Congress as a part of the files of the House of Representatives, subject to removal or withdrawal only by order of the House, a list of same and receipt therefor to be communicated to the House and published in the Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

Add at the end of the committee amendment the following:

"And the selection of the documents to be transferred to the Library of Congress shall be made under the direction and supervision of the Chief of the Bureau of Manuscripts of the Library of Congress."

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think that amendment to the amendment is satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. O'CONNELL. The committee will accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

STEAMSHIP SERVICE, UNITED STATES AND SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I call up privileged resolution (H. Res. 402), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 402.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives any recent reports from diplomatic or consular officers in regard to the question of the inadequacy of steamship service between the United States and South America and its bearing upon the export trade of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what this is?

Mr. GREENE. It is a resolution calling for information from the Secretary of State.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. About what?

Mr. GREENE. In regard to the adequacy of shipping facilities between this country and South America.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does the Secretary of State know about it?

Mr. GREENE. He has information from consuls and other officials of the departments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the gentleman proposing to have him send over here all of the reports of these consuls?

Mr. GREENE. This resolution speaks for itself. I do not think there can be any objection to asking for such information as the Secretary of State deems not incompatible with the public interest, to be sent to the House for information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The consular reports are already published and furnished to each Member of the House.

Mr. GREENE. This is simply to codify and send to this House information that will be of value, as it is believed by the committee. It is the unanimous report of the committee. The resolution was considered and unanimously ordered to be reported to the House without amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not a privileged report.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the point of order is presented too late. The resolution has already been discussed.

The SPEAKER. The report has been debated. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. GARRETT. I will state that I was on my feet to make a point of order at the time, but I did not hear it distinctly.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman did not make the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT. I did not have the opportunity to do so, and I came, then, to examine it while the colloquy was in progress.

The SPEAKER. Debate has taken place. The gentleman should have reserved the point of order.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON]?

Mr. GREENE. I do.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Do you not think this would have been proper information for the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to have had at the time they were considering a subsidy bill before that committee?

Mr. GREENE. The House, I think, will have ample opportunity to consider the subsidy bill when it comes before the House for action. The committee were satisfied with the information they had at the time that bill was reported.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Is not this information that should come directly to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GREENE. It will come to that committee if the House adopts this resolution, and the gentleman himself can have the information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is chairman has already reported a bill purporting to assist steamships engaged in trade between the United States and South America, and after it has reported the bill, it is now endeavoring to obtain information from the Department of State to bolster up its report. Is that true? That is, the "subsidyites" require their case to have additional bolstering by the department in order to make a good case before the country, and must obtain these files from the Department of State. Is that the object?

Mr. GREENE. The adoption of this resolution will give information of value to the House.

Mr. MANN. It is not trying to get information to bolster up the report, but to see if the committee knew what they were doing when they reported the bill without information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would suggest to the gentleman that he ask at the same time to recommit the bill, so that we may consider the bill again when we have the information.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Why does the gentleman confine the inquiry that he seeks to obtain the information about to "the inadequacy of the steamship service?" It looks to me like obtaining an opinion of the Secretary of State or the consuls. You do not want to inquire whether the service is adequate or not, but you want to inquire whether it is inadequate or not; that is, not all the information, but information as to the inadequacy.

Mr. GREENE. I think there will be no trouble. If the resolution is adopted, the House will obtain all the necessary information.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. As to the inadequacy, yes. But there might be some diplomatic or consular officers who would report that the service was adequate.

Mr. GREENE. If they should, the House will have the information.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. There might be others who might think it was adequate at the present time. Then we would only get the opinion of the diplomatic or consular officers who thought it was inadequate, and not the opinion of those who thought it was adequate. In other words, the resolution, it occurs to me, is a one-sided affair, and calls for one-sided information.

Mr. FASSETT. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GREENE. I yield.

Mr. FASSETT. This resolution would accomplish all that it is desired to accomplish if the words "of the inadequacy" be stricken from the resolution entirely. It should read:

In regard to the question of steamship service——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If I have the floor to offer it.

Mr. FASSETT (continuing)— between the United States and South America.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make that motion.

Mr. FASSETT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts would make that amendment, it will meet the objection of every gentleman here.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is the reason I called attention to it.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I would make a further suggestion to the chairman of the committee, and submit to him that he should also strike out the words "and its bearing upon the export trade of the United States."

Mr. GREENE. I do not think I could accept that amendment. I will accept the other amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand the gentleman will permit me to offer that amendment.

Mr. GREENE. I will offer it myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will indicate his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "of the inadequacy," so that it will read "in regard to the question of steamship service," etc.

Mr. GREENE. I call for a vote.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. GREENE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. It does not seem that it is necessary for the House of Representatives to ask for the opinion of these people on this question on the information that they have received. It seems to me that it would be proper to strike out the words giving their opinion as to "its bearing upon the export trade of this country." If we have the information ourselves, it seems like we could draw our own conclusions better than the State Department.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is afraid to have the facts and information which the consuls of the United States can shed on this question? The Secretary of State has eyes and ears all over the world in the nature of consuls, and from frequent reports give the Secretary of State information which no other officials of the United States have concerning the trade between the United States and foreign ports. I think it would impair the value of the resolution if such an amendment were offered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we are all desirous of ascertaining the necessary information, and I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether his committee has received any information compiled recently by the Commissioner of Navigation as to the steamship lines that were in operation between June 30 and December 31 of last year on the Atlantic coast between American ports and South American ports?

Mr. GREENE. I will remind the gentleman that there was an order issued for the publication of that, and it was put in the hands of the Commissioner of Navigation, and he has not yet sent it to the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have already received a copy. It was first prepared upon my personal request to the commissioner, and I would like to ask what additional information can be obtained from the consuls?

Mr. GREENE. I am not able to tell you; I can not tell you what will be in the report until it comes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not see why any gentleman should be disposed to shut out any of the facts. But is the gentleman aware that some of the information referred to, furnished by these consular representatives, has been criticized as being unfair and untrue by the shipping interests of this country?

Mr. GREENE. No; I have not.

Mr. STAFFORD. The State Department has been informed of this criticism and its fairness questioned.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we are getting unduly excited about a move in the right direction. Whether the Members of this House favor ship subsidy or oppose ship subsidy, everyone, if we can judge from the speeches that have been made, is interested in the restoration of American shipping on the seas. We differ as to the methods. Now, here is a resolution which looks to getting information which comes through the eyes and ears of the State Department. Under a recent executive order, with which I have no disposition at present to quarrel——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not now?

Mr. FASSETT. Because I am not feeling quarrelsome. It is impossible for any Member of this House to obtain information in the possession of any department of this Government without the official consent of the member of the Cabinet at the head of that department.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FASSETT. For a question.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the State Department has any diplomatic and consular reports upon this subject which have not been printed by the Department of Commerce and Labor in their regular consular reports?

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, in the strict interpretation of that word, but I understand——

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman reason to believe?

Mr. FASSETT. Yes; I have reason to believe, in the first place, that diplomatic reports are not published. Consular reports are, but they are edited before being published.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but sometimes diplomatic reports are published.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Speaker, I have reason to believe that there is valuable information in the possession of the State Department, but as to its bearing on this particular question one way or the other I am not fully informed, and I feel that I have a right, and every Member of this House has a right, to all the information in possession of the Government on this subject, and I hope this resolution will pass.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. FASSETT. I want to make one suggestion with reference to the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON]. I do not care whether these reports contain the opinion of a consular agent. I do not care to separate the opinion from the facts. I want it all, and when the time comes for discussion nobody can have any surprise sprung on him with reference to any opinion or any fact that our officials have expressed or ascertained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I ask the gentleman to reserve his motion——

Mr. GREENE. For what purpose?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. To enable me to ask him a question and to call his attention to something in the resolution that he may desire to change.

Mr. GREENE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the resolution reads:

> Communicate to the House of Representatives any recent reports.

It seems to me that would leave it within the discretion of the Secretary of State to make a selection as to the reports that he shall submit. I suggest to the gentleman that the resolution should carry the word "all" instead of "any," so that all the recent reports may be transmitted to us.

Mr. MANN. There is no difference in the meaning.

Mr. GREENE. I do not think the language is open to the construction that the gentleman seems to fear. I call for a vote.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask the chairman of the committee if he will reserve his motion for one moment, while I ask him a question?

Mr. GREENE. I will reserve it.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Would it not be better to amend this resolution, so that it would read:

> Communicate to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives—

this information, so that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries may have the right to question the Secretary of State and other officials who come before us in the proper consideration of this subject?

Mr. GREENE. When the matter comes up it will undoubtedly be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 21419, the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21419) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill. When the committee rose yesterday a point of order was pending to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY], on which the Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Missouri offered the following amendment:

> Page 19, line 18, after the word "dollars," insert:
> "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid any railroad which requires any telegraph or telephone operator who handles orders pertaining to or affecting the movements of trains to handle the mail between stations and post-offices."

Rule XXI provides that no provision changing existing law is in order upon a general appropriation bill; but the House may withhold entirely an appropriation for a lawful purpose or it may withhold the appropriation in part. It may also specify that the appropriation shall not be used for a certain purpose, under what is termed a "limitation." A limitation must be applied strictly to the appropriation. It must not limit the discretion of an executive officer by affirmative direction, and the language of the limitation must not be such as when fairly construed would change existing law.

The Chair finds upon consulting the precedents that an amendment to the effect that "no part of said sum shall be used to pay for the carrying in the mails any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating liquors of any kind," was held to be a limitation. Also, that "no part of any appropriation shall be expended for any purpose in any national home for disabled volunteers that maintains or permits to be maintained on its premises a bar, canteen, or other place where beer, wine, or other intoxicating liquors are sold" was held to be a limitation. The same ruling was made relative to an amendment that "no part of an appropriation should be paid to any trust."

Acting in harmony with these precedents and in accordance with the principle as to limitations established by the House, the Chair feels that he should hold the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to be simply a limitation on the appropriation and submit it for consideration by the committee. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not in any way relieve the railroad company from delivering the mail between the post-offices and stations. It simply provides that they shall not require a telegraph or telephone operator, whose duty it is to handle train orders or orders affecting the movements of its trains, to deliver these mails. They are a class of men who hold the lives of every individual who rides upon a passenger train in the hollow of their hand; if one mistake is made in the delivery of an order, or in the delivery of it to the proper train, it may result in the loss of human life.

There is no provision of law now which requires a railroad company to deliver the mail between post-offices and stations. It is a regulation of the Postmaster-General. I understand—I do not know it to be true, but I am reliably informed of the fact—that it is inserted in the contract with the railroad company who transports the mail.

I speak of this after having had some seven or eight years' actual experience as an operator and train-dispatcher, and for the last thirteen or fourteen years have had close personal observation of the doings in and around railroad stations and of the work that is required of this class of men.

I want to say, before I proceed further, that it does not cost the railroad company one dollar to have this mail carried between the post-office and the station. You are imposing no hardship on the railroad company. The pay of the railroad company is not fixed on account of their carrying the mails in this manner, but it is weighed in accordance with provisions of law, and their pay is fixed thereon. So you are imposing no hardship on the railroad company by requiring them to do this; but you are, by taking this class of employees away from this service, relieving them from hazarding the lives of people in taking care of the mail when it could be done by other people.

I remember, when working at a station in my district in a town of some 2,000 people—the post-office at that time was third class, but is now second class—I was working from twelve to thirteen hours at night. I was required to go to the post-office at night at a certain hour when the mail would be closed, get the mail, and take it to the depot. I was the only employee there at night. In the morning I was required to take the mail to the post-office, a block and a half distant. At that time it would average, besides the 2 pouches of first-class mail, from 8 to 11 sacks full of papers, magazines, and so forth. The postmaster would open the office at half past 4 in the morning, and I was required to deliver the mail not later than 5 o'clock. If I failed, upon being reported by the postmaster, I had to pay out of my salary $1 to the railroad company as a fine. This was a station where I handled from 20 to 30 and sometimes 40 train orders a night, and that hour of the morning was one of the very busiest I had. Yet, failing to answer the calls of the train dispatcher in delivering the mail subjected me to abuse by him, and I was finally reported by him and discharged for failing to attend to the wires.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman has just detailed the extra duty imposed upon him by reason of this order or departmental regulation. I will ask the gentleman if he received any extra compensation for this extra service that he rendered?

Mr. MURPHY. Not one dollar. I received the sum of $40 per month for my services. In addition to these duties of attending to the calls upon the wire I was required to sell tickets, both local and coupon, and was also required to book from two to three and four carloads of freight in a night in a book which was practically a copy of the waybills, giving item by item, the weight, the grade, and the amount of freight.

[Mr. MURPHY's time having expired, upon request of Mr. WILSON of Illinois he was granted unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.]

Mr. MURPHY. I had then to what was called "expense" those waybills, which was to make out what might be called a "statement" to each of those who received the freight, and that was a copy of each item and the rate and the amount of freight, and then totaled. They used kerosene for lighting, and I was required to clean all of the lamps in and about the station; they used switch lights and I was required to clean and fill the switch lights with oil and put them out at night and take them in in the morning. When I wanted any repairs for the switch lamps I would have to go to the section foreman for them. In addition, I had to sweep out the depot every morning. If the local trains reached there after night, and it was frequently so, I had to take the freight which was unloaded upon the depot platform and put it in the freight house.

Mr. HINSHAW. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he quit that job involuntarily? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; I was relieved from duty.

Mr. MANN. His strenuous service there landed him here.

Mr. MURPHY. In addition to that, I was required to check the baggage and load it, and I handled from two to three truck loads of baggage at night, in addition to putting the mail upon the trains and taking it off and putting it in the house. In addition, the railroad company required that the night operator must handle the express as well, and he must take that out on the trucks and put it on the two trains they had at that time, and there are four now, and put it in the house as well. These are some of the duties which are imposed upon this class of men, at that time receiving $40 a month, who to-day receive $50 a month.

I want to state to this House, as I stated before, that while there has been some increase in wages, a slight increase, I showed to this House and proved it to the conference committee in the Fifty-ninth Congress, that more than 100 operators performing this class of duty upon the Southern Railroad were paid the enormous sum of $20 per month. Some may say that the one-man station, the small place where only one man is required, is not a place where there is very much to do, and it is therefore imposing no hardship on the man to carry the mail. Go to these stations, in towns of 200 and 300 inhabitants, and you will find that the agent is busy from morning until late at night, and must go back after night in order to make out his reports and keep up with his work. He must perform the very duties that I have enumerated, that I had to do as a night operator. I had the pleasure of working at one of those stations. I would carry the mail to and from the post-office, and very frequently the postmaster, when I walked over to get the mail, would walk with me back to "see the train go through," and after the train passed would wait and accompany me back while I carried the mail to the post-office for him to open and distribute. [Laughter.] In nearly all of those cases the postmaster receives more than the agent. In many of these smaller places the postmaster is afraid to risk his registered letters in the mail pouch with his card receipt, as he can do, and I know from my own personal experience that many times he takes his registered letters and his receipt book over to the mail car and lets the railway postal clerk receipt him for them while he stands by the side of these operators and sees them put the mail into the cars, and then accompanies the operator back to the post-office.

In a city, one of the best in the country—I will not mention its name—not far from where I live, I can give you some examples.

There the railroad company employs an agent, three operators under the nine-hour law, and a helper. The day operator is required to handle the express, to make out the express reports, to handle the Western Union business and deliver it, to take and receive packages for shipment by express, and to deliver at the counter packages which are received. Notwithstanding the fact that a helper is employed, the duty is imposed upon the operators to see that the mails are delivered to and returned from the post-office and placed on the trains, and a failure results in a fine of $1.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit just one interruption?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you state that the railway mail clerks give receipts for registered packages without knowing whether or not they get them?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir. I said the postmaster, not trusting his registered letters in the mail bag with a receipt card which the railway postal clerk would sign and return to him by next mail, would take the registered letter in a book which is furnished by the department and go to the postal clerk and secure a personal receipt from him.

Mr. FORDNEY. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. BARNHART. In these statements you have made you have not indicated whether all this is the fault of the railway management or the Post-Office Department.

Mr. MURPHY. The Post-Office Department, by regulation, requires the railroad companies to deliver the mails to the post-office. And, for reasons which I could give to this House, but which I will not do at this time, the railroads impose that duty upon the telegraph operator in each and every case, although they have in their employ at many stations helpers who ought to be doing that work. If an operator fails to deliver the mail or to receive the mail or to put it on the train, the railroad company deducts from his salary the sum of $1 for each and every time, by way of a fine as punishment.

And I will give you another experience along that line which I had as an operator in the State of Texas. I was working nights on a railroad at Pottsboro, Tex.; just north is Denison, and south of Denison is Whitesboro, some 40 or 44 miles, and my station was the only telegraph station between them. There had been a wreck between Pottsboro and Whitesboro, which was to the south, and they would allow no trains to leave Denison, the terminal on the north, until the wreck was cleared. It took several hours to clear it up, and when the track was clear trains were released at Whitesboro and Denison, and to meet at Pottsboro. I had received some fifteen or twenty orders, most of them for passenger trains which had been held and going in either direction. Those passenger trains met at Pottsboro, and there were several freight trains upon the siding, which I had train orders for. Those two passenger trains carried mail. The train from the south must take the siding, and they were given authority by the train dispatcher, as we call it in railroad parlance, "to pull up and back in." They would pull by the station up to the northern switch and back into the siding and save delay to the train that was coming south. It had no more than backed in until the train from the north whistled. The conductors came into my office about the same time. I was delivering my orders to them the best I could, seeing to it that no mistake would be made, and that orders would not be delivered to the wrong train or none withheld which ought to be delivered to either train. I delivered the orders to the northbound train, which was ready to leave, and I told the conductor that he must wait until I could put the mail on the train. He said, "No; I can not do it." And he pulled out. By the time I delivered my orders to the conductor of the southbound train, and he in turn to the engineer, before I could reach the mail car to put the mail on, this train pulled out, and it cost me $2 that night for failing to deliver the mail and neglecting those orders.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURPHY. Of course that would not affect this amendment, and I only give it to you as an example to show to you what duties are imposed upon these men by the railroad companies in handling this mail. If this amendment is adopted it does not absolve the railroad company from delivering the mail between the station and the post-office.

If in the judgment of the Postmaster-General under the regulation he ought to do so, then it is up to the railroad company to make this arrangement. I neglected to state that in this city of which I spoke there are four men employed besides the agent by the railway company, and at the post-office there is only the postmaster and two clerks. The postmaster and the two clerks at that place receive $291.66 salary per month, while the five men at the depot receive from the railroad company only $280. In handling this mail, remember, they do not furnish the operator with a wheelbarrow or wagon or anything to carry it with. In transporting it the only means of taking it back and forth to the depot or the post-office is to lug it, package by package, in sacks, and vice versa, on their backs.

As I stated, Mr. Chairman, this class of men ought to be at their post of duty, where they can hear the call of the train dispatcher, receive the train orders they should receive, and, when received, should be there to deliver to the proper train, and they should not have all these duties placed upon them which distract their minds from their duties, and may cause, in fact, has caused, them to make mistakes. But some may say, "Why, you take some of these small stations; they probably do not receive one train order a day." That may be true, Mr. Chairman; but he ought to be there when that one train order comes to receive it properly, handle it properly, receive it and deliver it to the train to which it should be delivered, and see that his signal is in proper order, so that the train may be held. So I say it is requiring too much, and it is risking too much in this day and time, with the numbers of trains that are run to and fro upon the busy trunk lines of this country, to say that operators shall neglect their duty and hazard the lives of its passengers in order to save 25 cents a day, or such a matter, to the railroads of this country. I trust that this amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives very properly assumes that a committee considering a great appropriation bill, or any other measure, shall consider every feature of that bill—the desirability or necessity for increasing appropriations or the necessity for adopting any recommendation which it may make with reference to changes in existing law. The gentleman from Missouri evidently has not considered this as a new proposition. It is an old matter in his mind; yet during the six weeks the Post-Office Committee was considering this appropriation bill the gentleman did not appear before the committee and ask for a hearing; he did not ask any member of the committee for a hearing so far as I know. He is now asking this Committee of the Whole to legislate on a matter which is of considerable importance, maybe of great importance, without sufficient information. I do not know, and no member of this Committee of the Whole knows, what effect the amendment which the gentleman proposes will have on the service. We do know that in cases where a post-office is more than 80 rods from the railroad station we make provision for carrying the mail back and forth to the station, and we have appropriated in this bill $1,590,000 for that purpose. The gentleman from Missouri says it does not cost the railroad anything to transport the mail.

Mr. MURPHY. No.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. MURPHY. You do not mean that; that it does not cost them anything to transport the mail?

Mr. WEEKS. From the station to the post-office. I do not know whether it does or not. I do not know whether it requires additional men, but I do know that we are appropriating $1,590,000 a year to pay for carrying the mail to and from the post-offices where they are more than a quarter of a mile from the station. Now, this legislation ought not to be considered for a moment until we have had a hearing on it, until we have been advised by the department what effect it will have on their contracts with the railroads, whether it will necessitate additional expense on the part of the department, and in every way have all the knowledge which the committee should have on any and all important matters. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will not meet the approval of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I understood the gentleman from Missouri to say that the absence of the telegraph operator from the office while carrying this mail might be detrimental to the train service and cause an accident, because the train might proceed without orders. I undertake to say that the gentleman certainly does not mean that. If the telegraph operator falls asleep or falls dead, the train does not proceed without orders. Trains are not operated upon theory. They can not leave without orders. They proceed on orders; and if the telegraph operator at this station is away from the station delivering mail at the post-office when an order is telegraphed to his station, the train will not proceed until the operator returns to the station, gives the order, again telegraphs, and gives it to the train officials.

The gentleman from Missouri certainly knows that better than I do, and I know it well enough to know that that is the case.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman does not mean to make that statement. Does he not know that at many stations along the line of a road that are unimportant to the through trains something will occur after the train has passed a regular stop which renders it necessary to intercept the train with an order at the next telegraph station, where there is a natural clearance, unless the agent is there to receive that order; and is it not a matter of history known to us all that accidents have sometimes occurred because those orders, coming unexpectedly, have not been promptly received?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all; quite the contrary.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri, who has better information than I have.

Mr. MURPHY. Does not the gentleman know that many train orders are received by operators and delivered to trains as they are running through, and are handed up on a hook, without the train stopping?

Mr. MANN. That may have been the case when the gentleman was a telegraph operator, but it is not the case now.

Mr. HINSHAW. It is the case now.

Mr. MANN. If the train is to receive orders at a particular station, it may be that the operator will deliver them while the train is in motion, by handing them up; but if he does not hand up the orders, the train comes to a stop. Now, in my judgment, the passage of an amendment like this will only have this effect: It will relieve the railroad company of its present obligation to deliver the mail at the post-office and from the postoffice to the trains. It is certainly not the intention of Congress or the department to require the railroad company to maintain an extra official at a small station for the sole purpose of carrying the mail between the station and the post-office, something that does not occupy more than ten minutes a day and requires no effort at all. The result will be that the Government will be called upon to perform that service, which probably will not be done without some expense to the Government.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, under the regulation of the Post-Office Department, wherever the post-office is within 80 rods of the station, the railroad company must deliver the mail to the post-office. In all the controversies through the years on the matter of railway-mail pay the railroads have always claimed that that requirement was a great injustice to them, and they have always asked to be relieved from that regulation. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] is agreed to, at those stations where there is a single railroad employee—a telegraph or telephone operator at the station—it will then devolve upon the railroad company to hire some one, probably outside of the railroad service, to get that mail from the railway station to the post-office and back. In all the controversies over railway mail pay, where railroads have made the claim that they ought to have more money for the carriage of the mail, one of the reasons they have given is that they now transport the mail from railway stations to post-offices within 80 rods of the railroad. Our answer to that contention has always been that it did not materially affect the time of the employee of the railroad to make that delivery, and that it was not much of an expense, if any, to the railroads. The minute that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] become law, then you put an argument in the mouth of the railroad company for an increase of railway mail pay, because then it will cost them something to deliver this mail from stations to post-offices.

The railroads have always claimed that it cost somewhere between three and four million dollars per year. I believe that this provision in the law, which we find in the regulations, is an antiquity. It came about, in the first place, from the fact that the stagecoach carried the mail, and the regulation then was that if a new post-office was established within 80 rods of the main-traveled road, the stagecoach should turn out and deliver the mail to that post-office without extra cost to the Government. The stagecoach is gone and the railway is here, but the old regulation survives. If it is to be changed, it ought to be changed after careful consideration in connection with the whole question of railway-mail pay.

Mr. FASSETT. Does the gentleman think this will work to relieve the railroads?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the railroads would certainly stand for this amendment, and would be pleased to have it come in, because in the end it will result in giving them a further argument for the increase of railway-mail pay.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman agree with me that it is not safe to take such an important step without further information?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do agree with the gentleman, and I believe the committee or the House should not touch this matter, which looks of comparative unimportance in a certain light, but may be very great in its effect, without information on the whole subject.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. If this amendment is placed on the bill, what is to prevent the Senate committee from going into it fully?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have found that it is not always profitable to depend upon the Senate to go into investigations in legislation. I want to say further that in the matter of appropriation bills the House devotes the major portion of its time to them, while the Senate, as the gentleman is aware, generally takes our findings and passes our appropriation bills in much less time than we devote to them.

Mr. AUSTIN. They will not do it in this case. Now, the gentleman has stated to the House that, in his judgment, we are paying the railroads too much for the transportation of the mails.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then what claim would they have for additional compensation on this account?

Mr. MURDOCK. One of the main arguments of the railroad companies for years for increase in compensation has been that this delivery of the mails from the railway stations to post-offices within 80 rods was a great expense to them. I do not believe that it is costing the railroad companies much money to make these deliveries. But the minute this amendment becomes a law, then it will cost the railroad company more money, and you will make the argument that they have made for years in part good.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the gentleman think they will get any more for transporting the mails?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am not able to answer that question. I know the minute your amendment passes you will make the argument that they have made for years in part a valid argument and a good argument.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, the gentleman will place his argument against theirs, that they are now getting more than they are entitled to.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WANGER. The pending amendment does not limit its operations to stations that have only a single operator, but it prohibits the payment to any company which requires any telegraph or telephone operator at any station from handling the mail between the station and the post-office.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is as I understand it.

Mr. WANGER. That is, whether they have one or a hundred operators so employed.

Mr. MURPHY. Do I understand the gentleman from Kansas to say that the railroads have been making an argument in order to get more money for all these years that this delivery was costing them a large sum of money?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Would there not be the same old argument hereafter? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. With this exception: That the committee and Congress have never considered the argument a very valid one, because the mail is usually delivered in these cases by the employees of the railroad company who are designated, who are disengaged at the time, to deliver the mail, or could be, without any great harm to the service of the railroad company, and who are not granted extra compensation for this service.

[The time of Mr. MURDOCK having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended five minutes.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask somebody a question—some one who knows; I do not care whether it is the gentleman from Kansas or the gentleman from Missouri. What proportion of post-offices are within 80 rods of the railway station?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know; I will refer that to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman from Kansas said that the railroad companies make the argument that this additional service costs them something, and they want more money. Did the committee ever ascertain how much the railroads were doing and what compensation they were receiving for it?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the various committees have taken up that subject, and they believe that, under the requirement, it was not costing the railroads any extra amount of money to deliver the mail in this way. But if you prohibit certain men in the railway service from delivering the mail from the station to the post-office, then you are making good, in part, an argument that the railroads have made for years. You are validating an argument that we have not considered valid.

Mr. MURPHY. Does not the gentleman know that in every case the railroad company has three to five section men at each station?

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, I am not a railroad man like the gentleman from Missouri has been, but my idea of section men is that a good part of the time they are out on the section at work.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the gentleman any information from the railroad company's own side, or from any other source, showing the cost it is to the railroads to deliver the mail to the post-offices and the return to the depot where the post-office is wihin 80 rods of the depot?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have seen the statement made in the hearings before commissions that the railroads claim that that service costs them from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year.

Mr. COX of Indiana. To what commissions does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think that information was given in answer to a question by Mr. Eugene Loud before the Wolcott commission, although I would not be certain as to that detail.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman says that he has heard this complaint on the part of the railroads that they ought to have more pay on account of this additional service, but that the committee has taken no stock in that.

Mr. MURDOCK. The railroads have always claimed that they ought to be relieved from this service.

Mr. HAMLIN. And that it costs them something, and therefore they ought to be paid more for the carrying of mail.

Mr. MURDOCK. That inasmuch as they were not relieved from this service and were made to perform it by a regulation of the department they ought to have more pay for the carriage of the mails than they otherwise would have.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the point I make, but the committee did not take much stock in that.

Mr. MURDOCK. They never did.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the Postmaster-General seemed to take a great deal of stock in it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think not.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the letter read from the desk here yesterday, is not that the first reason that the Postmaster-General gave as a difference between the cost of carrying the mail and the cost of carrying the express?

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not listen to that letter, and the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I will just read that part of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I do not want to go into that matter now. The gentleman can read that in his own time.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will read that letter later on.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the gentleman's answer to the question a while ago. Did I understand him to say that the railroad companies pay from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year for this service, or claim that they do?

Mr. MURDOCK. They claim that that service costs them from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year.

Mr. MURPHY. I want to state to the gentleman from Kansas, knowing it as I do and from the experience that I have had and what I know to-day, that the railroads do not pay one cent for this additional service.

Mr. MURDOCK. And I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that that has been the conclusion of virtually every commission before which they have appeared, and if the gentleman from Missouri succeeds in making his amendment law, then he makes the claim of the railroads good in that respect, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], takes the position that this matter has not been considered by the committee; that we have not sufficient information. I think that the gentleman is in error in one part of his statement, and that is that we have no information. Those of us who have been on the Post-Office Committee for years past know that it is only in the comparatively small offices of the country, comparatively small railroad stations of the country, where there is only one individual, that person the railroad agent and the telegraph operator. These offices, Mr. Chairman, are comparatively few in number, and any claim made here that the passage of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY], a limitation on this appropriation, will cost the railroad companies of the United States $3,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $2,000,000 a year, is a statement not founded in fact. It will cost no such sum, nor will it cost anything like that. There are very few offices of that character. This amendment will only apply where there is only one person at a railroad station.

Mr. FASSETT. There is nothing in the amendment to limit it.

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, the gentleman knows that I am speaking of the amendment in its practical application. The gentleman from New York understands that, and he knows as well as any man on this floor that where a railroad office is large enough to require the service of more than one person then there is no necessity for the telegraph operator performing that service, and that is the point I make. At many of the offices in this country, where the post-office is within 80 rods of the railroad station, there are 2, 3, and often a score and more of persons in the employ of the railroad. Any one of those persons other than the telegraph operator can perform this service, and as a matter of fact they do perform that service to-day. So the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] in its practical effect will only apply to a few small railroad stations in the country where there is only one person employed by the railroad at that station.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Would it not be possible at each of these small number of stations, to which the gentleman has referred, where there is employed but one man, and he the operator, to have the postmaster himself attend to the transportation of the mail?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no question of that; but it is equally possible, and at a very small expense to the railroad or otherwise, to have this service performed by some one else.

Now, the purpose of this amendment is to safeguard human life in travel. It often happens, and I have seen it happen myself, at one of these small stations, even where there is a telegraph office, a train would come by at a high rate of speed, sometimes passenger trains which do not stop there at all, and a message from the train would be thrown out. Often the same will happen in the case of a freight train. A message from an official of the railroad in charge of the train would be dropped out.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Can the gentleman tell us who was responsible for the Terra Cotta wreck here some three or four years ago? Was it not the mistake of an operator?

Mr. FINLEY. My understanding is that it was.

Mr. MURPHY. The operator gave the wrong signal?

Mr. FINLEY. Gave the wrong signal.

Mr. MURPHY. I will ask the gentleman whose mistake it was that caused the death of Samuel Spencer, the president of the Southern Railway Company?

Mr. FINLEY. Well, my general information on that subject is this, that the Southern Railway at that time worked its operators overtime, and it resulted in a very, very great catastrophe and loss of life. Since that time, I am glad to say, this condition has been improved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that he may continue for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LLOYD. In any of the cases here related, do you know that the carrying of the mail in any way interfered with the duty of the operator, or in any of these cases was it true that because he was required to carry the mail the accident occurred?

Mr. FINLEY. I submit the question to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY]. No doubt he is better informed than I am.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. We passed a law here a few years ago limiting the day's work for telegraph operators to nine consecutive hours. That was done in order that the men might not be overworked. Now, does it make any difference in its practical results whether the overwork consists in the excess of hours or amount of duty required to be performed?

Mr. FINLEY. The merit of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri lies in this fact: That a telegraph operator in charge of a telegraph office should be at his post of duty all the time when, by the rules of the railroad, that office is required to be kept open, so that he may receive any and all messages relative to the dispatch of trains or the running of trains. It is in this way only that the public may be safeguarded in travel, and I think the amendment is meritorious. I think it would cost practically nothing to the railroads or to anybody else. The number of these offices, in my opinion, is very, very small.

Mr. FASSETT. Why do you not limit the amendment, then?

Mr. FINLEY. Where there is more than one person engaged in the service of the railroad at a railroad station, that other person can carry the mail. So the effect of this amendment will only be to apply this rule to offices where there is only one person.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is one of the best informed men on postal regulations that there is in this House. He has given this matter particular atttention in the committee when it has been considered. Do you believe that it would be the right thing, on notice of the department, to require the postmaster to go to the depot at these little stations and obtain the mail?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that under the discretion that is now lodged in the Postmaster-General, he can by a little regulation bring about exactly what the gentleman from Missouri asks in his question.

Mr. LLOYD. If the postmasters were required to do it, it would not cost the Government any additional sum?

Mr. FINLEY. Not a cent; and even if the Postmaster-General does not by regulation so order matters, as the gentleman from Missouri has suggested, then it will cost the railroads very little. I am not one of those who stand here and believe in conservatism of conditions as they exist. This is a progressive age, and the volume of travel increases each year.

Mr. LLOYD. Do you think it would be any hardship upon the postmasters of these little places to be required to go to the stations and get the mail?

Mr. FINLEY. Candidly I do not, and that matter can be arranged by executive order.

Mr. MURPHY. If the gentleman will allow me, in nearly all of these places the postmaster receives from $10 to $15 a month more than the operator who delivers the mail.

Mr. FINLEY. No doubt that is often true. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is a good one, and hope the Committee of the Whole will adopt it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall not occupy but a moment of the committee's time, but I want to make this one suggestion: I have had a little bit of the experience that my colleague from Missouri has had as a railroad station agent, having filled that responsible and unremunerative position at one time, and I am prepared to believe that his statement is almost entirely accurate. But I am not going into that feature of it now. I want to reply to my esteemed friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], in whose judgment I have the very greatest confidence. I believe, though, that the solution of the whole proposition is simple. While I am convinced that the expense incurred by the railroads in conveying the mails from the station to the post-office and back again, where the post-office is within 80 rods of the station, is, in a majority of instances, very small or nothing, yet they always plead that as a reason why increased pay should be given them. It seems to me the matter can be solved in this way by the Government: Require each one of these railroad companies who make this claim to file with the Post-Office Department a statement of the expenses that this service entails upon them each year. It is a matter easily ascertained; and if it is a million dollars over the entire country, or three millions or five millions of dollars, then let the department deduct that amount from the total amount paid to the railroad companies for carrying the mail, and relieve the companies from this service, and then the Post-Office Department can use this money so deducted in employing somebody to carry this mail from the station to the post-office and return.

In doing that, I am satisfied that the Government would save two-thirds or more of the amount that the railroads claim this service costs them. As said by the gentleman from South Carolina, there are very few stations that this amendment would affect. I know from my experience and observation that it is extremely hazardous to require the telegraph operator, who is charged with the movement of trains, and upon whose conduct depends the lives of hundreds of people, to be compelled to cart this mail from the station to the post-office and from the post-office back to the station again. But the Government can furnish somebody to be paid a very small salary out of the amount allowed to the railroad to do this work.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Missouri know that since 1872 there has been a law on the statute books requiring the railroads to furnish to the Postmaster-General a statement showing the cost it was to the railroad to transport the mail, and up to the present time that law has been a dead letter on the statute books?

Mr. HAMLIN. Why?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That would reach back to a criticism, and would reach the Postmaster-General for not enforcing it. I want to say in that connection that recently the Postmaster-General has called upon the railroads to transmit to the Post-Office Department this information, and I understand they are now preparing it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not make this statement in the spirit of criticism; but it appears to me that these annual endeavors on the part of the Post-Office Department to get this information occurs just about the time each year that they want to put through the post-office appropriation bill, and after that bill is through then their efforts seem to cease in that regard until it is about time to pass another appropriation bill.

Mr. FASSETT. I do not think that is a fair statement.

Mr. HAMLIN. You do not think it is a fair statement? Then I say it is a fair statement for this reason, that we are told that they make this effort every year; but no living man upon this floor is able to put his finger on any report ever made on the subject.

Mr. FASSETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can the gentleman cite me to such a report?

Mr. FASSETT. Why, certainly; the report of the Wolcott commission.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have heard of the report of the Wolcott commission for the last ten years.

Mr. FASSETT. And the report of the Overstreet commission; and if the gentleman will read them, he will see that something has been done.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, let us not go so far back into ancient history, but let us come down to the present time. What is the report, if any, now?

Mr. FASSETT. If you are coming down to present times, the effort is already being made.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would be ashamed to stand on the floor and plead what was done ten years ago. I will tell you what I think the trouble is. They talk to us to-day about a $63,000,000 deficit in the Post-Office Department. If that department could be transformed from a political headquarters for the Republican party into a business department, then there would be no $63,000,000 deficit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FASSETT. And yet gentlemen on that side want to make every post-office a political headquarters by requiring that postmasters be elected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MURPHY) there were—ayes 30, noes 43.

Mr. MURPHY. Tellers!

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WEEKS and Mr. MURPHY.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 57.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 18, after the word "dollars," insert:
"Provided, That no part of this amount shall be paid to any railway company which does not have all mail cars in use on its line of sound material and structure."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to make an explanation. Under the present law the department has the option of indicating the kind of car, the manner of construction of the car, the arrangement of the car, and the amount of equipment required for conducting this service. I do not think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee adds anything to the present limitations of the law, and it simply complicates the question with something which has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, it is true that under the act of 1879 a certain discretion is lodged in the department in fixing the conditions with reference to cars; but I do not think the department has ever satisfied itself fully of the construction that can be placed upon that act. For instance, I find in the hearings this year that Mr. Stewart, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, expressed doubt whether under that act the department would have the right to order a company to build a steel car. The department is in doubt about the particular construction of that act, evidently; but whatever power the department may have, I wish to say that it is unquestionably true that there are cars now in the service that ought not to be in the service.

Mr. WEEKS. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. Has the gentleman seen such cars himself?

Mr. GARRETT. I am reliably informed that there is now hanging in an office at Memphis, Tenn., a rotten plank from a railway mail car that was crushed in a wreck on a railroad a few miles out of Memphis less than a year ago.

Mr. WEEKS. I submit that that plank is not now in the service, and that that car is not now in the service.

Mr. GARRETT. Three railway mail clerks were injured in that car when it was crushed like an eggshell. The planks were rotten when the wreck occurred, and the clerks suffered by reason of the unsound condition of the car.

Mr. SHERLEY. And some of the clerks are not in the service now either.

Mr. GARRETT. And some of the clerks are not now in the service. Again, there has come under my observation a case that occurred last fall not very far away from my home, in which two young men from my own county were caught in a car that had been in use for twenty years and were crushed to death. Again, less than a month ago, on another railway running through the district in which I live, a car that had been in the service for more than twenty years was caught in a wreck, and the four clerks who were in it at the time were injured seriously, though none of them were killed. Mr. Chairman, it is my recollection that the statistics show that one out of every twenty mail clerks is either killed or injured in the service.

The mail car is the most dangerous point in the train. All things considered, perhaps these railway mail crews are composed of as efficient men as there are in the country. They are always working at the point of greatest danger; and while I would not undertake now, because it would not be effective, by any amendment on this appropriation bill to compel railway companies to build steel cars, yet I do believe that they ought to be required to furnish cars that are sound in material and in structure.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does not the gentleman believe that the railroads ought to be compelled to furnish steel railway mail cars?

Mr. GARRETT. They ought to be strong cars. Whether they ought to be steel cars or not there is a question. Whether they ought to be all-steel cars or a steel base only is a question, but they ought to be compelled to furnish safe cars.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman understands that the proof shows that a steel car can be built for $14,000 or $15,000.

Mr. GARRETT. About twice the cost of the ordinary car.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The ordinary car costing $6,500 or $7,500.

Mr. GARRETT. I think they should be compelled to furnish cars sound in material and structure. I am willing to go into that question of steel cars, but of course we can not here on this amendment or by amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT) there were 25 ayes and 38 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The provision of the act of March 2, 1907, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes," authorizing adjustment of compensation to be paid for the transportation of mail on land-grant railroads at the rate of $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds, is hereby amended to authorize the adjustment of compensation at $15.39 for such weight from July 1, 1910.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill some questions relative to the matter just talked about by the gentleman from Tennessee. As I understand, the law now requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a report to the Post-Office Department as to any defects that they find in regard to postal-mail cars, and so forth.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that is true.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am quite sure that it is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. As corroborating the gentleman from Kentucky I want to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission does have agents for inspection of these postal cars and that they make their report to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, what I am coming to is the important fact—whether anything ever comes out of these reports. From what I can learn the Post-Office Department seems to be very hostile to the idea that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have anything to do with the matter, and that these reports are received and filed and that is the end of them.

I feel very strongly in line with the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee. You hardly ever read of a railroad wreck in the South—and it is particularly true there because of the older rolling stock, the companies being less able financially to put on new stock—that you do not learn of a postal car being smashed to pieces in the wreck, whereas at the same time the baggage car and the express car and the Pullman car are not substantially injured. That is due to the fact that the cars are unsafe. I would like to know what the Post-Office Department is doing as to reports made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not able to give the gentleman from Kentucky absolute information on that subject, but I want to say that it is within the province of the department to limit the kind of cars that are furnished for this service and to limit the character of construction of new cars. The department does that. There are 50 steel cars in this service recently built by the Pennsylvania Railroad. I understand the Pennsylvania Railroad is going to supply that kind of a car in future. In many cases the department has stipulated that cars with a steel frame or a metal platform shall be used. There is no evidence before the committee that there are unsafe cars in use in this service.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not mean to say that it is under the direction of the department that the Pennsylvania Railroad is constructing steel cars?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think the department has ever taken the position that they could insist on steel cars.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is true that the Pennsylvania Railroad is installing some of the best and most modern cars, but we are not speaking of that situation. It is also true that on some of the roads and branches of the roads where the demand for up-to-date cars is not great and where the money of the road is not sufficient, or at least they do not think it is sufficient to enable them to get new stock, cars are being used that do endanger the lives of the employees. The reason I speak of that is that the gentleman from Massachusetts opposes an amendment that would limit the appropriation for any such cars. If that is true, then the responsibility is upon him and upon the department to see to it that in the future there shall be no criticism due to the use of cars that are not safe.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, there is no testimony before the Post-Office Committee that unsafe cars are being used now.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is testimony being brought here on the floor of the House to that effect.

Mr. WEEKS. The committee inquired particularly about that, at considerable length, and found out what was being done to provide safe cars for the government employees.

The committee appreciates the necessity, as much as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], that the best possible equipment should be furnished for this service. It has not seen fit to stipulate that all cars furnished should be steel, but there is not a word of testimony before the committee that the equipment is not improving in quality, that the department is not stipulating the kind of car that is being used, and that, on the whole, the equipment is not in good shape. The statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky, I submit, is not testimony. He has an impression that men are killed and injured in railway accidents. They are killed and injured; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not simply that I have an impression now, but I know, from the reading of the accounts of the accidents as to the damage done to these cars, as compared with other cars coupled right with them, that they are not cars of the same strength and resisting power. That is not a matter of inference; it is a matter of fact.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman may know from some newspaper account, which could not be verified.

[The time of Mr. SHERLEY having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted five minutes more.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I know, also, from the statement made to me personally by railroad clerks engaged in the service, who have investigated the matter. There was an accident in Indiana recently, within eighteen months—I can not recite the place now—where there were several men injured and, it may be, some killed, where the car was not of sufficient strength, and there are plenty of roads down in the South where that condition is existing to-day. I simply wanted to make the statement to the gentleman that if the House is going to take the responsibility of saying that we, who desire to, shall not amend the bill so as to correct this condition, then you who so vote and the department must see to it that the condition does not continue. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the most that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] says is very accurately said. I think, however, that it is not quite true that the postal car is so much inferior to the baggage car or the coaches. The truth is that a very large proportion of the cars now used by the railroad companies, constructed of wood, are really fit only for kindling wood; and if it were possible to at once construct sufficient steel cars to handle the passenger business of the country, I think our committee would bring in a bill to that effect. The railroad companies have learned recently, in the last few years, that they have got to construct steel cars, and there are now in construction several large plants throughout the country for the sole purpose of constructing steel cars; and I think that as soon as there are sufficient establishments to furnish the steel cars in place of the wooden cars Congress will be called upon and it ought to pass a law forbidding the use of any wooden car either as a passenger car, an express car, a baggage car, or a postal car in interstate commerce.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Are they still constructing the wooden cars?

Mr. MANN. They are still constructing wooden cars, more or less, because there are not sufficient establishments yet to construct a sufficient quantity of steel cars. The average wooden coach is just as bad in that respect as the average wooden postal car. The Pullman cars are so strongly constructed that it is a very rare thing for anyone in those cars to be injured in a wreck, and every coach and every car in a passenger train ought to be so constructed that it is practically impossible for it by a mere collision to be smashed up.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulty, and I realize that we could not to-day require the substitution of steel cars for mail cars now in use, but what I want to impress upon the committee is this fact, that there are wooden cars to-day being used in the mail service of such a character as to make it absolutely sure that in case of accident they are going to be crushed like an eggshell.

Mr. MANN. That is true also of the coaches.

Mr. SHERLEY. But it is, I believe, even more true of the mail car.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they use coaches worse than mail cars.

Mr. SHERLEY. That fact is found in the ratio of the killed and injured of postal clerks as compared with other people traveling on those trains.

Mr. MANN. The postal clerks occupy the most dangerous position in a passenger train.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true, and one of the reasons it is the most dangerous is the character of the car they are in.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to admit, as far as that is concerned, that the cars are not of the proper character. They ought to be made as safe as possible, and I am quite convinced that the railroad companies appreciate that fact more or less—not all of them——

Mr. SHERLEY. More or less, but I fear a good deal less, and the poor roads——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that as rapidly as establishments are created which will be able to furnish proper complements of cars the railroad companies, whether they wish to do so or not, in my judgment, can and will be obliged to discard the present kindling wood they use and furnish steel cars which can not be smashed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to say——

Mr. MANN. And I am glad that this matter has been called to the attention not only of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, but to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which would have jurisdiction over the car question, including postal cars and other classes of cars, and it is a live matter in our committee. It is true we could go on and compel the railroads, as soon as they are able, to substitute good cars.

Mr. SHERLEY. But there is not a man in America but that knows it is only by continual pressure that we forced the railroads to adopt many of the safety devices that are used now, and I for one am not willing to let the matter rest optionally with the railroads. I appreciate there is some reason why they must not be expected to do the matter overnight, but unless pressure is brought, and strong pressure, on the railroads, they will always have an excuse not to do something that costs them money.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and of the committee, to show them that the department is not unmindful of its responsibilities and obligations in these cases. I agree in general terms with the gentleman from Kentucky that this service should be improved wherever it is possible to do it, but I do not want the impression to go out that the department is not taking every business precaution to prevent serious accidents to its employees. Let me read from the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

> With the usual careful attention to improvement in car equipment and the activity in car construction and renewals upon the part of the companies, the equipment is being kept in good condition. Ninety per cent of the full postal cars now in use have been built within the past ten years, and conform to the plans and specifications prescribed by the department. The older cars are being retired as fast as their physical condition requires it. When a car appears to be weak or unsuitable, inspectors of the Interstate Commerce Commission are asked to examine it and report upon its condition. If they report it unsafe the company is notified to withdraw it without delay.

So it compels a company to replace a car which the agent of the Interstate Commerce Commission reports is unsound and unsuitable.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend on page 19 by striking out all of the paragraph after the word "purposes," in line 23, and insert:
> "Fixing the compensation to be paid for transportation of mail on land-grant railroads at the rate of $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds is hereby amended to make such rates and compensation after June 30, 1910, $15.13 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of 48,000 pounds, and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation in accordance with this amendment."

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, the postal act of 1907, fixing the rates of railway mail pay, not only authorized the Postmaster-General to readjust that pay, but it fixed the rates and declared that the rate of pay to land-grant railroads for each 2,000 pounds carried above 48,000 pounds should be $17.10.

Now, that is a higher price than is paid for the same weight of mail under the 48,000 pounds, and consequently is a seeming absurdity, and it is excessive, and very appropriately ought to be reduced. The pending bill provides that the Postmaster-General shall readjust the compensation to be paid these land-grant railroads at $15.39, but it does not reduce the legal rate of compensation to those roads from $17.10, as now provided by law. Accordingly, the amendment which I offer, in the first place, reduces the rate of compensation to $15.39 for each 2,000 pounds above 48,000 pounds carried annually, and then authorizes and directs the Postmaster-General to readjust the compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WANGER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think you will admit that the whole section is subject to a point of order, will you not?

Mr. WANGER. It was subject to a point of order, but, having been debated, of course is not at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I sought to get recognition for the purpose of making a point of order.

Mr. WANGER. There have been two amendments. First, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] moved to amend. That was debated for a long time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to be recognized to make a point of order to this section, that it is new legislation.

Mr. MANN. I respectfully suggest that the point of order comes somewhat late, the matter having been debated for the last twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was not debated; gentlemen were debating a previous section about railway-mail matters.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate took place. It seems to the Chair that the gentleman from Michigan should have made known his wishes before this.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How could I when the Chair recognized some one before? He recognized the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Illinois, and now he has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Because the Chair recognized one gentleman to offer an amendment does not prevent another from making a point of order. The Chair will hold that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania, very briefly, in what particular does the gentleman's amendment differ from the provision in the bill?

Mr. WANGER. I will state to the gentleman from Kansas that the provision in the bill simply authorizes the adjustment of compensation at $15.39, but does not repeal the provision of the act of 1907, which fixes that as the rate to the land-grant railroads.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For tabulating and arranging information relative to the operation, receipts, and expenditures of railroad companies carrying the mails, including rental of quarters in Washington, D. C., $10,000, which shall be immediately available.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. Just what is to be accomplished by this?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Department has sent to every railroad company in the United States a very comprehensive list of questions, asking for information of all kinds relative to the service which the railroads are performing for the Post-Office Department. These questions were sent out last October or November. The returns are commencing to come in. It will require a considerable force several weeks to tabulate and get them into shape. This appropriation is for that purpose, and it is made immediately available, so that it can be used as soon as this bill is passed.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any idea as to how long this service will have to continue? The gentleman knows as well as I do that when clerks are employed in a matter of this sort it is a great temptation to delay the final completion of the work.

Mr. WEEKS. Why, Mr. Chairman, the appropriation is limited to $10,000. I take it that in perhaps two months this work may be done; but it will depend entirely on the number of clerks employed for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of freight or expressage on postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail bags, $375,000. And the Postmaster-General shall require, when in freightable lots and whenever practicable, the withdrawal from the mails of all postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, in the respective weighing divisions of the country, immediately preceding the weighing period in said divisions, and thereafter such postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, shall be transmitted by either freight or express.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can a gentleman make a point of order unless the Chairman recognizes him?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order upon the paragraph, as I did a moment ago, without recognition of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as a paragraph is read it is the right of any Member to make a point of order. He does not have to be recognized to make the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, as the Chair understands, it is the right of the Member without being recognized at all?

The CHAIRMAN. A Member can rise and make a point or reserve it, as the gentleman from Illinois has just now done.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how much is paid now by the Government for freight and how much for express on these post-office supplies?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the committee did not ascertain the amount paid respectively for freight and express, as I recollect the hearings of last year the amount paid for freight was many times that paid for expressage. The department only utilizes the express, as I remember the hearings of a year ago, where the character of the article is such that it should be sent by freight and has been withdrawn from the mails during the weighing period, and through some urgent need at some post-office to which it is dispatched it should be sent quickly. In these cases the department believes it would be an imposition on the railroad, when that character of equipment has been withdrawn during the weighing period, to send it through the mails when the exigencies of service demand quicker dispatch than by freight.

Mr. MANN. Well, the law prohibits them from sending it by mail. I suppose they pay some attention to the law in that respect.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the law prohibits that, of course it is merely directory, and it might be abused by nonobservance.

Mr. MANN. I apprehend there is no such intention. Now, I should like to ask, Are postal cards, stamped envelopes, and newspaper wrappers sent to any extent by freight?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are only sent by freight when they are in carload lots, but when in less quantities than carload lots they are sent through the mails.

Mr. MANN. Then, all of these supplies sooner or later get in the mail?

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as those that have just been designated are concerned—that is, postal cards, stamped envelopes, and newspaper wrappers, but not the empty mail bags or other equipment designated here.

Mr. MANN. I was asking about postal cards, stamped envelopes, and newspaper wrappers. Where do they send those in carload lots?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whenever a post-office makes a requisition upon the department for postal cards, stamped envelopes, or newspaper wrappers in sufficient quantities to amount to a carload lot, they will be sent to the large post-offices which act as depositories and as distributing agencies for the post-offices in that locality.

Mr. MANN. How many such post-offices are there?

Mr. STAFFORD. I should say in the neighborhood of 20 to 25. To be accurate, I will say that there is a different system as to stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers than there is as to postal cards. The depository feature only applies to postal cards. There is no depository for newspaper wrappers and stamped envelopes for distribution to other post-offices.

Mr. MANN. Has there ever been a carload lot of newspaper wrappers sent out at one time?

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether there has been a carload lot of newspaper wrappers alone; but very likely some of the large post-offices of the country, such as Chicago and New York, would make up a composite order of newspaper wrappers and stamped envelopes, and where there was a carload lot they would be sent by freight.

Mr. MANN. Does the committee know what proportion of postage stamps, postal cards, stamped envelopes, and newspaper wrappers are sent by freight, in proportion to the total quantity consumed?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not give the gentleman that information. I do not believe we made that inquiry of the officials when they were before the committee.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Are the postal cards printed by the Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. For many years postal cards were printed under a private contract at Rumford Falls, Me. They were printed there for forty or fifty years; but when that contract expired last year, bids were put in by the Government Printing Office, and the work is now being done at the Government Printing Office. I should prefer to have the gentleman defer this matter until we reach the item of postal cards.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether an investigation has been made to ascertain if it would not be a great deal cheaper for the Government to manufacture these postal cards and stamped envelopes rather than to contract for them?

Mr. WEEKS. For many years heretofore, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] stated, the Government contracted for the manufacture of postal cards, but recently, as a result of bids, it awarded the contract to the Government Printing Office. The character of card which it proposes to manufacture is very different from the old card. The old card cost about 21 cents a thousand, and the card that will be manufactured by the Government hereafter will cost about 30 cents a thousand.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 20, line 10, after the words "freight or expressage on," by inserting the words "magazines and periodicals."

Amend, on page 20, line 15, after the word "all," by inserting the words "magazines and periodicals."

Amend, on page 20, line 20, before the words "postal cards," by inserting the words "magazines and periodicals."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, how will that read if the amendment is adopted?

Mr. FINLEY. If I may answer the gentleman from Georgia, it will simply add magazines and periodicals to what is in this paragraph. The department will pay the freight or expressage on magazines and periodicals, in addition to postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail sacks. It simply adds the magazines and periodicals to the items I have mentioned when in freightable lots.

Now, under the law these items when in freightable lots, except magazines and periodicals, are shipped by freight or express, so that this amendment will simply add to it magazines and periodicals.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the gentleman's amendment is incorporated into law and there was a bundle of magazines to go from New York to California in a freightable lot, which means by freight or express, would it not be incumbent on the Post-Office Department in that case to send these magazines by express?

Mr. FINLEY. It could be done in that way.

Mr. MANN. Would not that be much more expensive than to send them by mail?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know about that. I will say that the department would do what was best and cheapest in the premises.

Mr. MANN. Would the Post-Office Department be warranted in sending mail matter, magazines, by freight from New York to California when in the ordinary course of business such freight would take from two to three weeks' time, whereas to send it by express would only take a few days' time? Would not the department feel it incumbent to send it by express, though under the gentleman's amendment it would cost more than it would to send it by mail?

Mr. FINLEY. I want to say that it would do no such thing.

Mr. MURPHY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY. Would it not be better to pay the increased cost during the weighing of the mail?

Mr. SMITH of California. Would it not be still better to send all the mail by express during the weighing period and bring it down to a science? [Laughter.]

Mr. FINLEY. The question which the gentleman from Illinois propounds, that the department would be compelled to send it by express, is not pertinent now. The contention is that the express rates are a great deal cheaper, but I will not go into that.

I will say that this provides for sending by freight or express. Is there a man in the House here that does not know that the Post-Office Department would send it in the manner that would cost the Government the least money? As to its taking two or three weeks to send a shipment of magazines from the great publishing houses in New York to California, of course it would not take any time like that. Certainly ten days would be sufficient.

Mr. SMITH of California. By what movement?

Mr. FINLEY. By freight.

Mr. SMITH of California. Let me give the gentleman some information. When I was at home I had a carload of news paper come from some place in Wisconsin to California, and it was exactly fifty-one days from Chicago to my place.

Mr. FINLEY. That was a case of lost freight, where it had got out of the way.

Mr. SMITH of California. We uniformly give ourselves sixty days from the time we put in an order for a carload of paper until we expect to get it. It does not always take sixty days.

Mr. FINLEY. That is, a carload of paper.

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; but that would apply to carload shipments of anything.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think everybody here will agree that when the Post-Office Department ships mail matter under the present law, it ships it by freight in freightable lots, and there has been no sort of complaint that it has ever been delayed in shipment, or anything of that kind. That very fact is an argument why there would be no delay in this case. The magazines are printed thirty days ahead, as the gentleman from California knows.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think the gentleman will recognize the difference between postal cards and wrappers, which have no season, and a magazine which ordinarily gives itself not more than ten days at the outside.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman knows that if there was any undue delay in the shipping of postal cards or newspaper wrappers, there would have been complaints made, and they would have been brought before the Post-Office Committee, and the gentleman knows that there have been no complaints of that kind. So the question of delay cuts no sort of figure here. If you do this, it will be possible to save this Government a great deal of money. We want to pay the railroads for what they do. We want to pay them for what is necessary only. Now, the law that is on the statute books provides for the shipping of these items that I have mentioned when in freightable lots. It will not interfere with the circulation of the periodicals and magazines at all to add this to the law as it is to-day.

The amendment that I have offered does that. Magazines, practically speaking, and periodicals also, to a large extent, are printed three and four weeks ahead of the date line. Now, is there anyone here who contends that it is impracticable to ship carload lots by freight from the great publishing houses of the country over a great part of this country? And if California is so far away that it is impracticable to ship to that point, then the shipments would not be made by the Post-Office Department. So there is nothing in that contention.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been a member of this committee for a great many years and has given the subject very close attention. I want to get the gentleman's opinion on this proposition: What does he say as to the postal laws now as to whether or not a publisher of magazines has the right under the law, as the law now exists, to ship his magazines by freight, upon the same principle that a man ships a carload of wheat? Has he got that right?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have made no special study of that legal proposition, but, answering offhand, I will say that I have not any very serious doubt about his right to do so.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman thinks, then, in other words, that the publisher of magazines has the same right to ship a carload of magazines by freight the same as a dealer in wheat would have the right to ship a carload of wheat.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; I say that offhand without any special study. I say I think he can. But I think the department can preclude him from shipping and then placing his publications in the mail.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think the gentleman is quite right. So far as my investigations are concerned on that point they have led me to this conclusion, that the publisher of a magazine has a perfect right to ship his magazines by freight just as a wheat dealer has the right to ship his wheat.

Mr. FINLEY. And they do it now.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I think so.

Mr. FINLEY. They do it at this time to a large extent.

Mr. MANN. Then, if the gentleman wants to require the magazines to be shipped by freight, why does he not propose that they shall not be received in the mail, and let the man who publishes them have control of the shipment of them by freight?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's question is a complete answer to it.

Mr. MANN. I should say not.

Mr. FINLEY. I think it is.

Mr. MANN. If the owner of a magazine is going to have his magazines shipped by freight, I can say to the gentleman he would much rather have control of the shipment and the routing of it than to turn it over to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this, that at present a great deal of second-class matter for short hauls is sent by express. For long hauls it is sent by mail. Now, my contention is to amend the law as it is to-day with reference to mail equipment and newspaper wrappers and postal cards, by including magazines and periodicals, when in freightable lots. I can not see, Mr. Chairman, how this will interfere with the circulation of magazines and periodicals. I can not see it in any light except that it will amount to a saving of millions of dollars to the postal service. Why, we have it that the shipment by freight to-day saves the Government $3,000,000 annually. That is the estimate, and I hope I have the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] now, that the shipment of these items saves to the Government $3,000,000 annually.

The cost here is $375,000 by way of freight for these items that I have mentioned, and if they were to go through the mail it would be at a cost of $3,000,000. Of course, then, we would not have the item for $375,000. So that if this amendment is passed it will amount to a great deal of saving to the Government; and if the law is enforced as it should be, and if there is a new ruling by the Post-Office Department that less than a carload lot is a freightable lot, then it will amount to many millions of dollars' saving, at least four times what it is to-day, on account of shipping newspaper wrappers and postal cards and mail equipment by freight. So I think, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is a good one.

As to the point of order, I do not think that will lie at all. However, if the amendment that I have offered is not in order, then the paragraph in the bill that I am attempting to amend is also subject to the point of order; and if the paragraph under consideration is subject to a point of order, then certainly under all parliamentary usage any germain amendment is in order on that paragraph.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Was it not substantially the argument of Mr. Wiley, who testified before our committee on behalf of the publishers, that the immense cost of transportation of second-class matter was due to the fact, or to one of the facts, that the Government was giving them better facilities for transportation than they really needed?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Sending this heavy stuff on fast trains, when if they send it on slower trains and mail routes, it would not cost so much?

Mr. FINLEY. Not only that, but, Mr. Chairman, there would be a fewer number of railroad post-office cars required. What is the necessity for filling a railway post-office car with magazines or periodicals and shipping from New York or Boston or Philadelphia to Chicago or St. Louis or New Orleans, or anywhere else?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. These items of postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail bags are all the property of the Government, are they not?

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. And the Government does not send them by freight or express because the cost would be less to send them by——

Mr. FINLEY. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars as to $3,000,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Less than the second-class rate they would be compelled to pay the railroads?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no second-class rate iin railway-mail pay.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Now, if a man paid the second-class rate on his magazines or newspapers, if the Government had the election to send them by freight or express, would he not in return expect the postal facilities?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, any further than this, provided the Government gave him a service that was fair, that was practical and sufficient, the publisher could not, and would not, complain. In fact, as I understand it, many of the publishers of magazines throughout the country have no serious objection to this proposition, when in freightable lots that the magazines be shipped from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or the place of publication in the East to Chicago or elsewhere. There they might be, and would be, distributed through the mails.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Is it not a fact, and does not the testimony before the committee show, that they send their magazines and their newspapers by freight or express at a less rate than they can send them by mail?

Mr. FINLEY. For short hauls; yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Would they not exercise this election rather than pay the rate required by the postal service, and then let the Government send these newspapers and magazines by freight?

Mr. FINLEY. By the long haul?

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. By any haul.

Mr. FINLEY. No; not at all. For the long haul the publishers would not do it differently than they do now; that is, where they ship at present short hauls by express or freight, or in any way they see fit except to place the publications in the mail. As for long hauls, they invariably place their publications in the mails and as a result the Government bears the burden. Wherever it is not profitable for the publisher to ship by express or freight, then they place their publications in the mails, and this is done in all cases on long hauls.

My amendment seeks to protect the Government in this matter wherever practicable. I do not want to do anything impracticable or that will affect the efficiency of the postal service, but everyone here knows that about the first week in a month magazines and periodicals are published for the following month and to a large extent the distribution begins, so it would not affect the publishers in the slightest, nor would it affect the efficiency of the postal service in the least to add this amendment to the law now upon the statute books.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, the cost to the Government for transporting the mails depends on the length of the haul, does it not?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no question about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has any information come to the gentleman from South Carolina individually or to the members of the Post-Office Committee that since this agitation began about this second-class matter a movement is on foot to have 12 or 15 of the biggest magazines published in St. Louis, in the heart of the continent, thereby reducing the haul of the magazines from one-fourth to one-half and thereby reducing the government expense that much?

Mr. MURDOCK. And give all the business to the express company?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What difference would that make, if the Government is losing at the present rate? I should think it would be glad to get rid of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. It would still have to take the magazines on the long haul.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There would be no long haul.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; there would.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is not more than 1,800 miles from St. Louis to any place in the country.

Mr. FASSETT. But 500 miles is the limit of the short haul.

Mr. FINLEY. The magazines, if all were published in St. Louis, would still have the same rates under the law that they have now, and still use the mails for the long haul. I do not think there is any question about that. On the short haul, whether sent by freight or express, the practice would be the same as at present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that the Government claims that it is losing on the second-class mail matter.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you reduce the length of the haul by one-fourth, one-third, or one-half, does it not reduce the expense that much?

Mr. FINLEY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then St. Louis is the place to publish them.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Right there, in that connection, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina, or anybody else on the committee, to answer this——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed at 10 minutes to 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I would like to know if it has been shown why packages can be sent cheaper by express than through the mails?

Mr. FINLEY. I will try to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman state where the line of demarcation comes in?

Mr. FINLEY. On short hauls it is cheaper to send magazines and newspapers, for that matter, by express than through the mails. The postal rate is one rate for the whole country. The express companies operate on the zone principle—so much within a certain distance. Now, when you go beyond the zone rate there is no profit in sending by express. Of course, then all that matter is dumped into the mails.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Wait a moment. You have not answered the question. What is the zone in which it is cheaper to send by express than by mail?

Mr. FINLEY. From 300 to 500 miles.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FINLEY. I am afraid I have not the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. We had testimony before the committee which showed that magazines were sent by express to the middle of Missouri, 1,500 miles.

Mr. FINLEY. There is a statement on page 33 of the Postmaster-General's report of the percentage of weight of second-class matter:

Scientific periodicals, 1.30; educational periodicals, 0.64; religious periodicals, 5.91; trade-journal periodicals, 4.94; agricultural periodicals, 5; magazines, 20.23; miscellaneous periodicals, 6.25.

Altogether this makes 44.27 per cent on this class of matter, consisting of magazines and newspapers, and so forth. So that, added to the daily newspapers, it makes altogether 84.77 per cent. The following table is interesting:

From the special weighings of 1906 and 1907 estimates have been made of the per cent of weight and the average hauls of each of the several subclasses named in the statute of 1906, subscribers' copies and sample copies combined, with the following results:

Class of periodical.	Per cent of weight.	Average haul.
		Miles.
Daily newspapers	40.50	291.27
Weekly and other than daily newspapers	15.23	558.20
Scientific periodicals	1.30	903.84
Educational periodicals	.64	733.75
Religious periodicals	5.91	682.50
Trade-journal periodicals	4.94	805.32
Agricultural periodicals	5.00	566.48
Magazines	20.23	1,048.67
Miscellaneous periodicals	6.25	1,128.10

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you can so amend the law that this class of mail when in freightable lots may be shipped by freight, in no case to the detriment of the postal service, nor to the service to which the patrons of these publications are entitled, you will save from ten to twelve million dollars a year in postal expenditures.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to have one minute in answer to the gentleman from New York, who propounded a very pertinent question, which it is difficult to answer. There was no dispute upon the proposition that in cases within a radius of 500 miles the express companies can and do haul second-class mail matter at less than 1 cent a pound, which is the post-office rate. Mr. Wilder, speaking for the magazines, fixed the zone at 620 miles.

In the Postmaster-General's report the distance is stated at 633 miles. The gentleman will find that the average haul for all second-class matter does not exceed 750 miles. So you can see that there is but little difference between all the gentlemen in fixing the radius of the hauls for which the express companies charge less than the postage rates.

Mr. FASSETT. Mr. Chairman, I just want to call attention to one interesting fact. The third-class postal rate is 8 cents a pound. That is for printed matter, such as books. The second-class rate in the mail is 1 cent a pound, so that a magazine will go for 1 cent a pound, and a copy of the Bible or Shakespeare at 8 cents a pound. The express companies cut just under the postal rate of 8 cents on third-class matter, and by grouping second and third class matter together they get an average rate of from 3½ to 5 cents a pound, and thus apparently carry the second-class matter farther than the Government does at a cheaper rate. Right here is a state of facts which deserves notice.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, on the ground that it is not germane to the subject, and that it is new legislation; but before doing so, I want to say that the Post-Office Committee has been giving considerable time to hearings on the subject introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY]. I am inclined to think that in some way, at some time, something will develop which will be beneficial to the department and the Government along that line; but it is in altogether too unfinished a condition to legislate upon without further consideration by the Post-Office Committee or the Committee of the Whole. For that reason I make the point of order against the amendment, and yield my remaining time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, there is not a word in the paragraph to which this amendment is offered that is anything but directory to the department as to how it shall transfer government property. The amendment that the gentleman seeks to inject is a requirement on the part of the postal authorities to do something with one class of mail matter after it has been deposited in the mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the amendment has expired by order of the committee.

The Chair is ready to rule.

The paragraph in question provides for the transportation of post-office equipments and supplies, and is restricted to them. The Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina is not germane, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 11, after the word "envelopes," insert "without printing thereon."

Mr. WEEKS. I make the point of order on that, that it is not germane to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts on the point of order. The Chair understands that the paragraph in the bill authorizes an appropriation for the transportation of stamped envelopes. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri seems to be descriptive. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to have the amendment again reported by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MANN. That will compel the carrying of all these stamped envelopes by mail instead of by freight or express.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if that amendment should prevail it would probably require the carrying of these envelopes by mail instead of by express or by freight and would be a very large additional cost to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that the effect of this amendment would be to send through the mails all stamped envelopes with printing thereon. I want to be frank with the committee. On page 26 of the bill is a provision that after June 30 next it shall be unlawful for the Post-Office Department to print or sell any stamped envelope bearing upon it a printed direction giving the name of any individual, firm, or company. I anticipate that that provision will go out on a point of order. It feel confident of that, and I propose to offer in other parts of this bill this very same amendment which limits the Government in sending, distributing, or selling envelopes to those which have no printing upon them. The objection may be made that they ought to print a blank return, allowing the party who purchases the envelope at the post-office to write in the name and return address of the purchaser.

As it is now, Mr. Chairman, these envelopes are turned over and a monopoly of the printing given to one concern. When printed the envelopes are transported from the place where the work is done and delivered over to the purchaser. If you will do that for the country newspaper, if you will transport the stamped envelopes to them, and sell to them at cost, let them do the printing of the blank returns, and allow the postmasters to sell them, as you do this concern in Ohio, the printing will be done at a price which the people will be perfectly willing to pay.

It has been argued on this floor that the Government makes some money out of the sale of these envelopes. I deny that proposition. If you figure the cost of carrying them through the mail to their destination, and if you figure in the cost of printing the envelope you will find that it is a loss to the Government and that it is partially responsible for the deficit that we have to-day.

As I stated, wherever hereafter the words "stamped envelopes" appear in this bill, with the exception of where they follow in this paragraph, where they have no appropriation to send them and therefore could not send them, I shall offer an amendment "without printing thereon;" so that the Government can neither manufacture nor sell any stamped envelopes with printing thereon.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MURPHY. I will yield.

Mr. SMITH of California. I suppose the gentleman is speaking in the interest of the printers. Does the gentleman think the printers would have any objection to the provision in the form in which it is written on page 26?

Mr. MURPHY. Let me say to the gentleman, when he gets to that part of the bill, I am satisfied that he will not be disappointed in seeing a gentleman rise to make a point of order against it.

Mr. SMITH of California. I have had probably as many letters on this subject as any other Member of the House, and perhaps not so many as some others. I have had a large number from printers in my State because I am in the business, and I suppose they assume that I have a fellow-feeling for them, which I have. I have been conducting a printing office for twenty-three and a half years, and a considerable and important part of the small business out of which I make my bread and butter, when I am not a statesman, is job printing, and I have never in the course of the twenty-three and a half years found a man in my zone of business who bought envelopes with the return card printed on them who would otherwise go to a local printing office and have them printed. The envelope bearing the return card is sold in very small lots out of the post-office window. Of course, that does not carry the person's name. I never knew a person in my county who had the Government print his name in connection with the return card.

And during all this winter when I have had letters from the printing offices or newspapers doing a job-printing business on the side, I have constantly asked them if they have found a customer in their respective communities who would be their customer if it was not for the Government Printing Office printing these return cards, and not one of them replied that such was the case. Of all the professional men, merchants, and all that class of people who have purchased stamped envelopes including the return card, I have never known one who patronized a local printing office instead of the Government.

Mr. MURPHY. Then, why do you not provide in this bill that the Government should furnish the uniforms to the postal carriers?

Mr. SMITH of California. I presume there is as little socialism in my blood as in any man in the House. I do not justify the printing because it is socialistic, but it has become a part of the business of the country, and it does aid the post-office tremendously in saving the duties of the Dead Letter Office.

While I favor the language on page 26 and think it goes far enough, I do not believe there is much foundation for the outcry against the present law.

Mr. MURPHY. Is there any more reason why the Government should print this private return card for the individual and for the firm and corporation or partnership than it should print their heads?

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not think so, but this does save much labor for the Dead Letter Office.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I regret that my friend from Missouri has offered this amendment at this place. I think it does not accomplish what it is desired to accomplish. He wants to prevent the Government from printing the name of the individual, firm, or corporation, or box, or building, on the return card of a stamped envelope. If his amendment prevails, it will only prevent the Government from sending stamped envelopes that have printing thereon by freight or express. It will not prohibit their manufacture or their printing, and the result is that the Government will be able to do that just the same and send them by mail, with the result that the present deficit in the Post-Office Department will be greatly increased.

I want to say further to my friend from Missouri that I do not believe that it is desirable, and I understand the gentleman does not desire, to prevent the Government from keeping on hand at the different post-offices of the country stamped envelopes with the blank return printed on the upper left-hand corner.

Now, then, if we do not want to prevent the department from doing this, then we ought to permit the Government to send those kind of stamped envelopes, with that blank printed on it, by freight or express, as is most economical for the Government. On page 26 there is a committee amendment that I understand is satisfactory to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY], and I think it is satisfactory to a large majority of the Members of the House, which has been put into the bill by the committee itself, the effect of which will be to prevent the Government after the expiration of the present contract from printing the name of a firm, individual, or corporation upon a return card on a stamped envelope. It is true that is subject to a point of order, as the gentleman has said. I gave notice the other day that if that went out on a point of order I would offer an amendment that would have the same effect, as far as the coming fiscal year is concerned, which would not be subject to a point of order, and there can be no question but that such an amendment can be drawn, and if I get recognition I intend to offer it; so that we will reach the point there, and not interfere with the operations of the department in a particular line that, as I understand it, nobody desires to interfere with.

Mr. MURPHY. If I follow this amendment with one on page 25, in line 23, by inserting after the word "envelopes" the words "without printing thereon," does not the gentleman think that will accomplish the object?

Mr. NORRIS. No. On page 25, line 23, if you insert after the word "envelopes" the words "without printing thereon" it would prohibit the Government from keeping on sale a stamped envelope with a blank return card printed on that envelope.

Mr. MURPHY. Oh, no; it would not.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; indeed it would; it could not have any printing. The Government would not be permitted to have on sale a stamped envelope with a blank return card printed thereon.

Mr. MURPHY. They could not manufacture them.

Mr. NORRIS. If we took that course, then we would be liable to one of the objections that the Post-Office Department has made against us for opposing the printing of a name on the return-card envelope. That objection has been made against our proposition, but, in my judgment, it has no legality and no reason for its foundation as far as applied to our objection to printing the name on a return-card envelope; but if the gentleman's amendment were put in at the place the gentleman suggests, line 23, page 25, then it would be impossible for an individual to go into the post-office and buy a stamped envelope with a blank place left to write in his name.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it not true that if the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] prevails, the Government may continue to print envelopes with return cards thereon, and send them through the mail and not ship them by express?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly they can. There will not be any question about that.

[The time of Mr. NORRIS having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted two minutes more.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, that they would have to send them through the mail.

Mr. NORRIS. Surely they would. They could not send them by express or freight, but could send them by mail, and thus increase the deficit.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is mistaken about that. If he will read on through the bill there, he will see that they must withdraw all stamped envelopes. It does not make any difference whether there is printing on them or not.

Mr. NORRIS. If I can get permission, I will have the amendment which I propose to offer read. Why not let us get a fair test of the House on the proposition upon an amendment that will absolutely prohibit the printing of the name of an individual, firm, or corporation on a return card on a stamped envelope? In order that there may be no misunderstanding, and in order that we may reach the question fairly and without doing it indirectly, and, as I believe, ineffectually, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read for the information of the House the amendment that I propose to offer in place of the proviso on page 26, the same being a part of the paragraph on the bottom of page 25, if the paragraph goes out on a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no part of said appropriation be used for the payment of the manufacture of stamped envelopes bearing thereon any printed direction, giving the name of any individual, firm, or corporation or any number of any post-office box or drawer, or the name of any building, to whom or to which the same shall be returned, if uncalled for or undelivered."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the gentleman from Missouri that if the amendment put in by the committee stays in, then, of course, I shall not offer the amendment which has just been read by the Clerk. If the gentleman's amendment were adopted, it would not cure the evil we are seeking to eradicate, but it would only prevent the Government from sending stamped envelopes by freight or express. They could still print the name of a person or firm on the return card on them and send them by mail under frank, and thus cost the Government an increased price for delivery, while getting no more for the product. The only effect, therefore, would be to increase the deficit in the Post-Office Department.

If the gentleman's amendment goes out and my amendment is offered and adopted, it will certainly meet the question as far as it can be met under an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For railway post-office car service, $5,047,000.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in line 25, page 20.

I desire to send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read in my time, a letter which I have received to-day from Mr. Underwood, president of the Erie Railroad Company, in regard to railway-mail pay.

Before it is read I desire to say that I submit the letter for the information of the committee without any comment on my own part. I do not of my own knowledge know whether the extraordinary statements that have been coming in to Members of this House during the past month, stating, for instance, that the Government is paying the railroads three and four times as much in proportion for carrying the mails as do the express companies, is true or not, but I do not believe that all sides are entitled to a fair hearing and fair consideration; and, therefore, as this letter contains matters of interest I submit it for the information of the committee. If the railroads are not receiving adequate pay they certainly should receive it. If any road is receiving an undue rate it should be reduced. I do believe, however, that the railroads perform a difficult and important service and are entitled to fair treatment and consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
February 28, 1910.

Hon. ARTHUR L. BATES,
Representative from Pennsylvania,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We desire to call your attention to some inconsistencies in the matter of railway-mail pay, which we trust the present Congress will remedy by passing a law which will fairly compensate railroads for service rendered the United States Government in handling the mails.

The present system of paying railroads for handling United States mails was adopted in 1873, and since that date reductions in compensation have been made as follows:

July 12, 1876, 10 per cent general reduction.
June 30, 1878, 5 per cent general reduction.

March 2, 1907, 5 per cent reduction, weights 5,000 to 48,000 pounds daily.

March 2, 1907, 10 per cent reduction, weights over 48,000 pounds daily.

March 2, 1907, 16.66 per cent full postal-car pay.

June 7, 1907, 9.65 per cent general reduction by Postmaster-General's orders No. 165 and No. 412 (not authorized by Congress).

Representative Overstreet's table in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 2, 1908, page 2871, showed reductions for 1907 amounting to a total of $8,101,433.61 per annum, equal to 16 per cent of the total appropriation for railroad transportation and railway post-office cars for the following year.

The Post-Office Department has during the past two years reduced the authorization for space payment in full postal-car service, notwithstanding the fact that in many instances the larger cars were requested by the department and constructed strictly in accordance with their specifications and in the face of no diminution in the quantity of mail handled nor in the number of separations made of the mails.

These reductions in railway mail pay have resulted in great injustice to the railroad companies and have made the handling of United States mail unremunerative to the railways, it being, above all other traffic, the most exacting, troublesome, and costly to transport.

To partly correct the injustice that exists through certain acts of Congress and post-office departmental orders, we hereby ask your support of a measure which provides for a readjustment of the rate of pay for full postal-car service, and includes a reasonable car-mileage rate for the use of mail compartments of different lengths provided for the distribution of mails en route.

No car-mileage pay is allowed for the use of mail compartments, except where a full car is used for distributing purposes, and the weight of mails carried in these 15, 20, 25, and 30 foot mail compartments is so small that it frequently results that railroad companies receive as compensation an amount only equivalent to the passenger fare of the postal clerks, leaving the companies to handle the mail at stations, transport it, and furnish a separate compartment in the train for its distribution for no compensation whatever.

The justice of paying for space used for distributing purposes was acknowledged by act of Congress allowing car-mileage pay where the full car is made use of for postal purposes. In equity a pro rata allowance to the railways should be made where a part of the car is used for distributing purposes. The use of this apartment by the Post-Office Department necessitates in many instances hauling an additional car, thereby increasing the costs to the railways to an amount more than the revenue received for performing the mail service.

There are other matters of importance worthy of your consideration, in our opinion, viz:

Railroad companies are required to handle mail between trains and intermediate post-offices located within 80 rods of railroad stations. At terminals they are required to transport mail between trains and the post-office regardless of the distance. This condition creates expenditures that are equal to the total revenue from the service. In fairness, the Government should provide for this service.

The method of adjusting the rate of pay for transporting mails on the basis of weights taken once in four years is unjust, as it requires every carrier to transport the always increasing weights without just compensation for four years. The weighing of mails should take place annually, with a proper readjustment of pay.

We ask that you give the foregoing matters your careful consideration. Any further information relating to the question of railway mail pay or service will be given you upon request, or our mail representative will call and personally explain to you anything connected with the subject.

Your influence in correcting these matters is also asked on the ground of justice to a taxpayer. The taxes paid by the Erie Railroad Company during the past year amounted to $1,369,523, an increase of 56 per cent since 1898.

Your attention is respectfully called to the attached exhibit, showing the relative prices of commodities and labor, and of railway passenger, freight, and mail receipts per ton-mile, from 1898 to 1908; showing that prices of commodities increased from 100 per cent to 138 per cent in 1907; the price of railway labor per day increased from 100 per cent to 130 per cent in 1908; the receipts per passenger mile decreased from 100 per cent to 98 per cent; and that railway mail pay per ton-mile decreased from 100 per cent to 79 per cent in 1908.

Yours, very truly,

F. D. UNDERWOOD, President.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey and Mr. GARRETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question having a direct bearing upon this other proposition that has been raised so often during the consideration of the bill by the committee, as to whether or not the railroads are getting more than they should be getting for carrying the mails. This view of the matter has occurred to me several times, and I want to offer it as a suggestion to the chairman of the committee. The Erie Railroad, a letter from the president of which has just been read, operates a number of branches throughout my district. One of those branches I am very familiar with. It is known as the "New York and Greenwood Lake Branch," running from Jersey City up into the mountains to Greenwood Lake, a distance of perhaps 40 or 45 miles.

Now, the conditions on that railroad are such that they never carry enough mail to induce them or to compel them to operate a mail car, and on many of the other branches of the Erie Railroad running throughout the northern section of New Jersey the same situation prevails. Now, this is the point I want to make: They receive no rental for the compartment cars. They receive nothing, as I understand it, for that portion of the car that they dedicate for the handling of the mails. They are paid by weight, regardless of how little space it would take for handling the mail, and I know by personal experience it actually requires very little space. They are compelled, however, to dedicate considerable space to that function. If they are being properly compensated for carrying the mails by weight and under those conditions compelling them to allot a certain amount of space, does it not necessarily follow that the other railroads, which receive this additional compensation of rental in addition to the compensation they receive for weight, are in all probability receiving too much, a matter about which, of course, I do not know and do not express any opinion?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee does not know what a correct answer to that question is. But it is his opinion that those short-line railroads—at least some of them—are receiving less than the service is worth. At the same time, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] should remember that the Erie Railroad quite likely runs trains with railway post-office cars on them, and in that way it may make up what it may lose on its short branches. The New Haven Railroad, which receives something like $650,000 a year from the Government, and which has a large number of short branches where compartment cars are used, and railway post-office cars are never used, is making the contention that it loses about $350,000 a year in transporting the mails, and it is threatening now—it is carrying the mails under protest—to bring suit against the Government for $350,000, which it claims it loses annually in conducting that service.

Of the space furnished by railroads about one-half is railway post-office cars. The other part is made up of apartment cars. No railroad receives anything for less space than 40 feet in a car.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to state this, in order to make the proposition as clear as I can: The Erie Railroad on its main line operates between New Jersey and Chicago; at any rate, that is as far as I have ever gone on the Erie Railroad. It operates five other branches. I have no doubt that any one of these other branches will carry more passengers and in all probability more mail than the main line, and I do not think it is possible—at least, I think it is highly improbable that it would be possible—for the Erie Railroad to make up on the main line on the mail that is hauled for any great deficiency on these branch lines; so that it seems to me it is the duty of the Post-Office Committee to determine as nearly as possible—and it must be possible—whether or not a railroad, such as the Erie Railroad, is sufficiently and adequately compensated for the work it does on these branch lines. If the railroad which does not have business enough to justify mail cars is being fairly compensated, then there is no question in the world but that the lines which are enabled to keep mail cars and receive rentals for them are being largely overpaid. If that is not true, then it necessarily follows that these lines are being underpaid, and I do not care which of these propositions is true, because I believe that if it is demonstrated that the railroads are being underpaid, that they should be properly paid, and if overpaid their pay should be reduced. And if it is demonstrated that some are being overpaid and some underpaid, then something should be undertaken to equalize the rate of pay.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I am in perfect harmony with the expression made by the gentleman from New Jersey. We have just within an hour made an appropriation of $10,000 for the tabulation of certain statistics which I believe will give to the Post-Office Committee information which will enable it to come to a reasonable conclusion in regard to this question.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, after the word "dollars," in line 25, insert:
"Provided, That no part of this amount shall be paid for rent or use of any car which is not sound in material and construction."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not wish to try the patience of the chairman of the Post-Office Committee——

Mr. WEEKS. You can not do it.

Mr. GARRETT (continuing). Or the Committee of the Whole, but I really feel very deeply upon this subject of having sound cars in which the railway mail clerks do business. Now, it may be that I feel more deeply than I have in the past, because of a heartrending scene witnessed of two dead and mangled mail clerks drawn from a car which had been in use twenty years and which was crushed in a wreck—two young men that I knew well and that I liked well. I wish to reiterate what I said here a few moments ago——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman say that the car had been in use for twenty years?

Mr. GARRETT. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman remembers that he opposed replacing revenue cutters that had been in use forty-five years?

Mr. GARRETT. But the revenue cutters were not run by postal clerks.

Mr. MANN. But there were sailors on them who might lose their lives.

Mr. GARRETT. That proposition was an entirely different proposition from this.

Mr. MANN. Of course.

Mr. GARRETT. We paid nobody for the use of the revenue cutters. However, I am not going into that, and the gentleman from Illinois knows quite well that there is a very decided difference in the two propositions. If he does not, the people do, and so it is no matter whether he knows or not. I shall reiterate what I said a while ago. In the section in which I live within the last year there have occurred three wrecks.

In one of them the postal car was crushed and the car, according to my information, had been in use for twenty years, and the clerks were killed. On another road, in the same section, another wreck occurred, and I have been informed that the car had been in use for twenty years. I am told that there is hanging in the office of the railway-mail clerks, in the city of Memphis, a plank taken from that crushed car which is rotten, and the defects of which were covered up by paint. Within the last six weeks, on another road in the same section, another wreck occurred in which four postal clerks were seriously injured; and the car had been in use for twenty years and was practically worthless. I do not believe that the Government ought to pay rent, and I do not believe it ought to permit its servants to go into such cars to work; and they ought not to pay rent for any car that is unsound in material or construction.

Mr. WEEKS. This question has been considered by the Committee of the Whole within an hour, and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee was voted down. Ninety per cent of the cars now in use have been built within ten years, and the proportion, if there are any cars not suitable for service, is very small. But as the gentleman feels so strongly on this question, believing it does not make any reflection upon the department, disavowing any suggestion that the department is allowing cars to be operated of the description the gentleman suggests, I will not vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the amendment by inserting the word "sanitary" before the word "sound."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Before the word "sound" insert the word "sanitary."

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, according to what I have read regarding this subject, I believe there is need of more careful attention being given both to the matter of sanitation in these cars and to the matter of having sound cars in use. I read testimony to the effect that some of the railroads are installing steel cars that are entirely satisfactory to the men who have to work in them, and that other companies have not furnished those cars, and that as the train passes along at a high rate of speed sewage has been blown up into the drinking tanks. For that reason this amendment should be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice, commencing in line 5, on page 20, there is a provision appropriating $10,000 for tabulating and arranging certain information relative to the operation, receipts, and so forth, of railroads carrying the mails. I should like to ask whether that contemplates the procuring of information relative to the cost of operating these cars in carrying the mails and to the rental of postal cars?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand that it does.

Mr. SHARP. I should like to ask further whether there has been any testimony adduced before your committee on the subject of the Government owning its own postal cars?

Mr. WEEKS. That question was asked of the Postmaster-General, and he sent the following reply:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1910.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 21st ultimo, transmitting a copy of House resolution 295, introduced by Mr. SHARP, requesting the Postmaster-General to submit to the House of Representatives the result of any investigation that may have been made by his department regarding ownership by the Government of post-office cars, and report what action, if any, has been taken contemplating such ownership, and requesting that I give the matter early consideration, has been received.

In reply, I have the honor to inform you that no formal investigation of the subject of government ownership of railway post-office cars has been made by the department. However, some years ago some information was secured by the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, which is set forth in his testimony before the Postal Commission in Part 2, at page 679, of the volume entitled "Railway Mail Pay; Testimony Taken by the Commission to Investigate the Postal Service." No action has been taken by the department contemplating the ownership by the Government of such cars.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK, Postmaster-General.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I am very well aware that the subject of the Government owning its own postal cars is quite an old one. There is nothing new in it. I claim no originality in its revival by the introduction of the following resolution which I introduced in Congress a number of weeks ago bearing upon this subject and asking the Postmaster-General for certain information in reference thereto; but it is because it is an old subject, and because it was recommended by a distinguished Postmaster-General, the Hon. William F. Vilas, nearly twenty-five years ago in the strongest terms that I now wish to bring it up for consideration or discussion, at least, at this time.

House resolution 295.

Whereas, according to the recent annual report of the Postmaster-General, there was incurred an expenditure of about $4,700,000 during the past fiscal year for the use of railway post-office cars, constituting one of the chief burdens in maintaining that service; and

Whereas it is believed, from results obtained from a similar policy adopted by private shippers and carriers, that the Government could greaty profit by owning its own mail cars, the annual rental of which in some years has approximated the value of the cars, thereby also adding to the comfort and safety of a large number of high-grade employees who, from the nature of their employment, are necessarily exposed to unusual danger; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be respectfully requested to submit to the House of Representatives the result of any investigation that may have been made by his department regarding ownership by the Government of post-office cars, and report what action, if any, has been taken contemplating the same.

In answer to this resolution and for the promise of reporting the same out to the House, I wish to thank the genial chairman of the committee [Mr. WEEKS]. The Postmaster-General, as appears in his reply above quoted, briefly referred to an investigation by a commission appointed about ten or a dozen years ago on the subject of government ownership of postal railway cars. Upon following that line of information a little further and finding out just what testimony was there adduced, I was surprised to find that what seems to be a very important subject was dismissed at that time with little or no discussion by the commission and by Mr. James E. White, General Superintendent of Railway Mail Service, in a very few lines. But I was impressed by the fact that that testimony, in so far as it related to expense of maintaining the postal cars, thoroughly corroborated the estimates of Postmaster-General Vilas made nearly twenty-five years ago.

Mr. White, in his testimony before that commission, gives the following figures as to the cost of maintaining these postal cars: Lighting, $275; heating, $365; cleaning, water, and ice, and so forth, $365; repairs, $350; life of car, fifteen years; value of car being estimated at $6,000, or $400 per annum. These items all have reference to annual charges. The total only makes a figure of $1,756, which may be charged up against the expense of owning, maintaining, and operating these cars and refunding back at the end of fifteen years, the supposed life period of a car, all that it originally cost. I have been interested during the last few days in the arguments advanced by the Postmaster-General's department to the effect that we ought to have a new additional post-office in the city of Washington, estimated to cost something like $3,000,000. In advocating this a distinguished Senator at the other end of the Capitol has used the argument that we could issue bonds, which would not be a charge on the Government of more than 2½ or 3 per cent per annum and would save to the Government about 15 per cent per annum on the amount involved, which we now pay for the rental of outside buildings for the use of this department.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if it is good to economize in that particular line of the Post-Office Department, it is equally wise to give a very thorough investigation to this matter of the government ownership of the railway postal cars.

Here is what Postmaster-General Vilas reported upon this subject in the year 1887, and it would seem to me that his arguments are as applicable to the present conditions as to those with which he had to deal during his administration of the Post-Office Department:

Among the possibly desirable amendments of present methods there appears to be one step of great advantage to the Government, one preparatory to any more radical change, which may be immediately taken without the least injustice to the roads. I append a table (Appendix D) showing all the lines of railway on which separate postal cars were, on the 30th of June last, run for the additional pay, their respective lengths, number of trips, annual mileage, number of cars in use and in reserve for contingencies, the size of such cars, average weight of mail, annual transportation pay, annual post-office-car pay, and total compensation; and the whole recapitulated in a summary exhibit. Careful inquiry discloses that very many of these cars, such as they are, would not cost to build $3,000 each; that the best 50-foot cars can be built for $4,000 to $4,500 each, a new 60-foot car equal to the most complete and handsome now in the service for not over $4,600; and that taking together all the post-office cars in the United States, their average value does not probably exceed $3,500; certainly not much more.

Pursuing the inquiry into the cost of cleaning, heating, lighting, supplies of oil, ice, dusters, scrub brushes, soap, lamp fixtures, pails, and other minor articles of daily use, embracing all necessary labor, and including ordinary repairs, it appears that $60 per month for each car in use is an ample provision. The appended table shows that all the post-office cars in the service of the department number 432, of which but 342 are in ordinary use and 90 are in reserve on different lines for contingencies. It is within bounds to affirm that all these might be to-day purchased or their duplicates manufactured for $1,600,000; add for cleaning, etc., as above, at $720 per year each for 342 in use, $246,240, the total is reached of but $1,846,240. Yet simply for the use of these cars for the last year, including cleaning, etc., the department was under the annual rate of charge by the existing system of $1,881,580, and the estimate deemed necessary to submit in prudent provision for the coming fiscal year, on the same basis, is $2,000,000.

Instead, then, of appropriating $2,000,000 to rent the use of these cars for the coming year, why should not the appropriation be of a smaller sum to buy them, and of another, say $250,000, for their keeping, the two together not aggregating the proposed rent? The department will thereafter gain at least $1,500,000 per year while sustaining the cost of casualties.

* * * * * * *

It can not be objected that the department is unable properly to assume the charge of these cars. The department can easily discharge these functions. It might receive the custody of all the cars in the service and thenceforward care for them on a month's notice. With moderate addition to its force, the railway mail office can provide for the manufacture of all necessary. Whatever may be done by any private hands may as well be done by the department.

Ownership by the Government of its postal cars can not but much relieve the difficulties of the compensation problem. So far as they are concerned, their transportation may be compensated, doubtless, by the payment of a just price per mile for the distance each car is run, upon a scale not difficult to arrive at fairly, to be accompanied with simple provisions for the protection of the mutual rights of the Government and the transporting companies. The advantages and convenience of such a system will find many strengthening arguments which are not now enlarged upon. Provisionally, the continuance of the present rate of payment would be more than just, as has been demonstrated.

Of course the Government Railway Mail Service has greatly increased since Mr. Vilas's report, the number of postal cars having substantially doubled during the twelve years preceding the time at which the commission above quoted made its report. Since the latter date there has been a further similar increase in the number of such cars until there are at the present time something over 1,100 of them in active use and more than 100 kept in reserve. Then, too, the cost for the construction of the more modern mail cars would be much in excess of the amount estimated by Mr. Vilas. But if the size of these figures has been greatly increased since that time, so, too, has been the compensation paid to the railroads for the rental of railway post-office cars, rendered necessary by the tremendous growth of the mail business in recent years. The amount of appropriation for this purpose called for in the section just read is about three times the total annual rental paid in those years back in Mr. Vilas's régime. In other words, the annual rental at the rate asked for in this bill would certainly amount to enough at the end of two years to buy outright, at a fair price, all the mail cars now in use, in addition to lighting, heating, and properly maintaining them.

I listened with much interest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in reference to his proposed amendment to compel the railroads to furnish safe and first-class mail cars. I do not think that he overdrew the arguments in favor of safeguarding the lives and providing for the comfort of that great army of faithful public servants, the railway mail clerks.

It is a well-known fact that few kinds of employment are more hazardous, and the long list of the names of dead and seriously crippled men engaged in that service testifies to the risks encountered. Indeed, the very zeal of the Government to transport mail with the highest speed and the competitive tests demanded of the railroads only increase the hazard assumed by these faithful public employees; and, together with the brave fireman and engineer at the throttle of their engine, in case of accident the brunt of the peril is thrown upon them. Not too generously paid at best at a time when their salaries have but two-thirds of the purchasing value of years past, too much care and concern for the safety and comfort of this class of men can not be manifested by our Government. I refer to some of these facts because I can not but feel that if the Government should now commence to adopt the policy of building each year a certain number of its own postal railway cars, better care in their construction, both with reference to safety as well as comfort, convenience, and sanitation, would result.

I very much hope that the Post-Office Department, in gathering the statistics to which the chairman refers and tabulating the same, will not lose sight of what seems to be another important phase of this question and which may shed not a little light upon the advantages of government-owned cars. I refer to the practice long in use by many large private business concerns of owning their own transportation cars. These companies transport many different kinds of commodities, ranging from oil and chemicals to food products, and it would seem to me that the policy which has evidently been demonstrated as the most economical system of transportation by these successful companies could be well tried by our Government in transporting its mails.

So, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say, without the slightest reflection upon this very able Post-Office Committee, that has gone so thoroughly and carefully into all the many and varied questions involved in this bill, that it seems to me the Post-Office Department in years past has at least shown a lack of concern in not having given a far more thorough examination of the merits of a question of such importance in the economical administration of its affairs.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter in my hand from the Postmaster-General relating to the cost of the railway post-office cars, which I would like to have printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1910.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry made of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in regard to the cost of maintaining and operating railway post-office cars and its relation to the compensation received by railroad companies for the same and your reference to the speech delivered by Senator Vilas on the subject in the United States Senate, February 13, 1895, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

The department has not at this time sufficient information upon this point to give from its own records a reliable estimate. As you are aware, we have recently asked railroad companies to submit answers to inquiries with reference to the cost of operating the mail service, and it is believed that when these shall have been received we will be in a position to furnish such information. Inasmuch, however, as it may be of importance to you to have estimates made from time to time by others and such incomplete information as we have at present, I submit the following:

The cost of operating a railway post-office car has been variously estimated (but not officially by the department) as from 15 to 30 cents a car mile. The average run per day of such a car is about 300 miles. Estimating the cost at 18 cents a car mile, the total cost of operating such car for one year would be $19,710.

The specific items which constitute this total cost are not definitely known to the department. However, as to the cost of lighting, cleaning, repairs, etc., the General Superintendent of Railway Mail Service furnished the following estimates before the commission to investigate the postal service in 1899, viz: Lighting, $276; heating, $365; cleaning, water, ice, oil, etc., $365; repairs, $350; proportion of original cost of car (estimating the life of a car at fifteen years and the original cost at $6,000), $400; total, $1,756. Recent inquiry gives the following as the approximate cost of maintaining a car at the present time: Lighting (electric), $444; heating, $150; cleaning, $360; repairs, $300; oil and brasses, $120; interest on cost of car (at $7,500), $300; annual deterioration (estimating the life of a car at twenty years), $375; total, $2,049. These figures give the cost of a car built according to the department's standard specifications. The cost of modern steel cars being built by some of the railroad companies is from $14,000 to $15,000.

The compensation received by a railroad company for operating a car and carrying the mails in it would be approximately as follows:

The pay for a 60-foot car at $40 a track mile per annum, for a track mileage of 150 miles, would be $6,000. The average load of a 60-foot car, according to statistics obtained recently, is 2.83 tons. The rate per ton of an average daily weight of 50,000 pounds carried over the route is $25.06. At this rate the company would receive $10,637.97 per annum for the average load of mail hauled in the car. This sum added to the specific rate for the railway post-office car ($6,000), makes the total pay for the car and its average load $16,637.97 per annum.

Senator Vilas's argument was based upon the theory that the rates fixed for railroad transportation alone, based on the weights of the mails carried, are adequate compensation for all services rendered, including the operation of railway post-office cars, and that, therefore, the railroad companies would be required to operate postal cars owned by the Post-Office Department for the compensation allowed by law for the weight of mails alone, including apartment-car space and facilities. Such theory is not justified by the facts, as will appear from the following:

A careful perusal of the debates in both Houses of Congress which led to the enactment of the present law fixing the rate of pay for railroad transportation of the mails and for railway post-office cars clearly indicates that the additional compensation for railway post-office cars was intended to cover the additional expense imposed upon the railroad companies for building, maintaining, and hauling such cars. The companies at that time insisted that these cars, which were practically traveling post-offices, did not carry a remunerative load, and that therefore the amount of pay, based on weight, did not compensate them for their operation. This led to the specific appropriation for railway post-office cars. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the purpose of the railway post-office car is to furnish ample space and facilities for the handling and distribution of mails en route. Therefore the space required is much greater than would be required for merely hauling the same weight of mails.

In regard to any proposal for government ownership of postal cars, other facts as well as the above should be given consideration. Such cars must be overhauled, cleaned, and inspected daily. It would be necessary to either arrange with the railway companies for this service or for the department to employ its own inspectors, repair men, and car cleaners at a large number of places throughout the country, which would probably be more expensive than the cost to the railway companies in that respect at present. It would hardly be feasible to establish a government repair shop. Therefore the department would be compelled to use the shops of the several railway companies throughout the country. Without the closest supervision and attention of the Government's inspectors it could scarcely be expected that our cars would receive the same consideration in railroad shops as those owned by the railway companies. These shops are frequently congested, and it is probable that the railroad work would be given the preference.

Yours, very truly,

FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question or two. I want to ask him in regard to the cost or earning power of these cars. All the matter that has been discussed here is quite confusing to me. I would like to know what a car running from New York to Chicago, for instance, earns per mile—the gross earnings.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that information is included in the letter I have just sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is $40 per mile.

Mr. HAYES. I mean including the charge of the railroad company.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. On a car carrying 5,000 pounds it would be about $280.

Mr. HAYES. Running from New York to Chicago?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. From New York to Chicago and back.

Mr. HAYES. And how many mail clerks?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Six.

Mr. HAYES. What is the fare of the passenger from New York to Chicago?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Eighteen dollars, I think; about that.

Mr. HAYES. So that seven passengers in the passenger car immediately in the rear of the mail car would return to the railroad company about as much money as they get for carrying the mail car.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The pay of that car is $40 per mile per annum. Now, if that car could run from New York to Chicago and back every day in the year the car would earn $40,000. If you assume that one car could travel from New York to Chicago and back again three hundred and sixty-five days in the year it would earn $40,000; that is, $40,000 per year for 1,000 miles of track.

Mr. HAYES. I want to get some basis, so that we can compare other similar service.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is in an alleged speech which I made in the House last Saturday, as between Philadelphia and Chicago.

Mr. HAYES. Is that speech in the RECORD?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes. My recollection is that the passenger car earns considerably in advance—I know it does—of the postal car. A passenger car carrying 13 passengers earns more than a mail car. An express car returning to the company 60 per cent of its earnings pays considerably more than a mail car.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return for a moment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and amended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NICHOLLS], in order that a correction may be made which the present wording requires.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEEKS. I now offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "sanitary" insert a comma and the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: For 13 division superintendents, at $3,000 each; 13 assistant division superintendents, at $2,000 each; 5 assistant superintendents, at $2,000 each; 19 assistant superintendents, at $1,800 each; 141 chief clerks, at $1,800 each; 301 clerks, class 6, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 1,491 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 628 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 2,757 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 2,251 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 6,403 clerks, class 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 2,775 clerks, class 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 600 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $900 each; 600 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $20,549,175.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph covering page 21 and occupying 25 lines. It is, to my mind, an expression of the highest industrial development in the world. It represents the Railway Mail Service. A man in the Railway Mail Service is the finest skilled workman in the world, in my opinion. The whole service in the United States has attained an average of efficiency of 98.65 per cent. Each man in the Railway Mail Service is not only a workman of skill, but he is also a student. He is regularly put through a most rigorous examination. He must not only know the stations in the States, the 60,000 post-offices in the United States, but he must keep himself constantly informed as to all the changes of schedules of trains. There are men running between Syracuse and Cleveland who know whether to throw a letter directed to a town in central California north or south to obtain for it the quickest dispatch across the country.

There are men running from New York to Washington on the railway postal cars who know more about the post-offices of North and South Carolina than do the Members of this House who hail from those States. There are men running from New York to Pittsburg who know more about Kansas and the towns in it and the counties in which they are situated and the way they are reached by the mail trains than do the men who represent the State of Kansas in this body. This is the finest service in the world. It is at the very tiptop of the whole industrial organization of the United States. Other branches of the postal service halt at some time in the day. This service goes on continuously. There are men in it who work for thirty continuous hours.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means they are on service for that length of time.

Mr. MURDOCK. They are on service for thirty continuous hours. Strike down for one day the Railway Mail Service and the whole postal system would fall. Strike it down for a single twelve hours and the commerce of the United States would halt. The men in this service are skilled not only in hand, but in mind. Now, for the first time in the history of this Government, in the section of the bill following the one under consideration, an attempt is to be made by the committee to give those men an expense allowance of 75 cents a day when they have been out twelve hours in the service. [Applause.] That plan is reported unanimously by the committee. The proposition may have a point of order made against it. I sincerely hope, and more deeply than I have ever hoped on any single item I have ever had anything to do with in this House, that not a single man in this House will raise his voice against the proposition. [Applause.]

This Government has a corps of the most skillful men in the world. There has never been an army or a navy or a commercial organization of 16,000 men which has exhibited the efficiency that this body of government employees do. They are not paid excessively. Their salaries range from $800 to $1,600 a year. They occupy, as has been said repeatedly here to-day, the most hazardous place on the train. Three or four days ago, out in the West, when the cars of a railroad train went into the ditch they carried with them eight men in the postal cars, and to their death. This House ought to be appreciative of good service. It ought to help these men out. It takes unanimity of sentiment amongst us to keep this proposition in the bill, and I want to see that unanimity here. I would be for this proposition if it stood alone, but we are doing some things for other portions of the service along similar lines.

In city delivery we spent $965,000 for horse hire, and for vehicles and for car fare and bicycle allowance, $460,000. In the inspector service we give a per diem of $325,000 annually and livery hire of $50,000; traveling expenses for the chief inspectors and inspectors in charge, $25,000; to the assistant superintendents we give a traveling expense of $18,000 annually; in the service for special-delivery letters, $3,000 annually; in the special-delivery service we give a car-fare allowance of $13,000 annually. That is, in all those branches in the way of traveling and similar expenses we expend annually $1,816,000. All we are asking for the postal clerks in the railway mail trains in this bill this year is $250,000, and I hope that no man here will raise his voice against it. [Applause.]

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have not since I have been here this winter spoken except in committee in relation to our postal business. It is a business that you ought to cherish and care for to the extent of your ability. I do not believe that you know the full extent that you are indebted to the railway mail clerks and the business that they perform for you while you sleep comfortably in your beds. What was said of them by my friend who is on the Postal Committee, the encomiums which he paid those railway clerks, are richly deserved, and no higher compliment could be paid. And I hope, as he has said, that this legislation which is proposed by the committee will be adopted, and if a point of order is raised I hope it will not be acceded to. Do what you ought to do, do the best you can for a body of men than which are none more faithful and efficient, and the people of this country will applaud and commend. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to state that the sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] have my sincere approval; and I hope that nobody, at least on this side of the House, will make a point of order against this provision.

Mr. MANN. Nobody over there will have the nerve to do it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not care what qualifications they lack, but I hope they will not make it.

Two or three years ago I offered an amendment of substantially this character, which was subject to a point of order, and, as I recollect, the point of order was made, and then I cited a case that came within my personal experience and a case that caused me to offer and support the amendment which was then offered.

It was that of a railway mail clerk upon one of these branches of the Erie that have been referred to this afternoon. In addition to being compelled to travel on the Erie Railroad, somewhat of a punishment in itself, this young man received a salary of, I think, $675 a year, and was compelled to remain at the end of the line every night when he had finished his run. It was impossible for him to get back home, and, as he explained the situation to me, he was the son of a widowed mother, living in Jersey City, paying rent there and supporting his mother, but every night was compelled to go to a summer hotel and pay for his lodging, pay for his supper that night and his breakfast the next morning.

Mr. MANN. When was this?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think it was prior to the last increase in the railway-mail pay. I think my remarks will show that I do not claim that exactly this condition exists now.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but I wondered how long ago it was.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It was some two or three years ago. I referred to the matter before on the floor of the House, and the gentleman from Wisconsin took issue with me in regard to the amount of salary paid. But whatever the merits of the proposition were then, I will not raise it now, and I will not say now what this man was receiving or what the man who is on that run now is receiving, and I will admit that it is one of the lowest-paid runs in the service. But to-day whoever has that run is compelled to finish up at the mountain end of the New York and Greenwood Lake division. The service is not in effect in the winter time. He must go there when the hotels are full. How this man was able to pay his way is beyond my comprehension, because I had some experience as to the charges made by the hotels in the summer time at that place in that particular year. The man now receives, I think, $800 a year, and every day that he works he has to pay out of his own pocket for his supper, his lodging, and his breakfast. Now, Mr. Chairman, while perhaps this legislation is not of such a character that it will suit the individual exigencies of each case, yet it will help a man situated like this.

If it is true, as perhaps it is, that it will help men who do not really need it, because they are getting salary enough to enable them to meet an occasional additional expense of this kind, yet it will reach a great number of cases; it will help a great number of poorly paid men who are now sent out and who have no option as to where they are to go or when they shall return, and who do not receive salary enough to enable them to discharge this additional expense, forced upon them by the service, in addition to their fixed expenses and charges at home. I sincerely hope that the provision will be permitted to remain in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make a pro forma amendment for the purpose of making some remarks on the subject of the railway-mail service generally and the cost of handling the mail. In the Postmaster-General's report, on pages 26 and 27, the cost of handling the several classes of mail is gone into in detail. I merely want to call the attention of the House to a matter which sometimes heretofore has been called attention to by Members, as to the use of the franking privilege, and its cost. The country, through misinformation, has been impressed with the idea that the deficit in the handling of the mails was caused in a great measure by the franking privilege accorded to Members of Congress by the law. That misinformation has been conveyed to the country, as if the franking privilege was alone used by Members of Congress, and the great sum of $64,000,000 of deficit was caused by the franking privilege. This has been mainly charged by those who are in a great measure the beneficiaries of the cheap rates on certain classes of second-class matter, and to which the Postmaster-General and the President attribute the deficiency.

Now, I find on page 27 of the report of the Postmaster-General, in discussing these matters, he says:

INQUIRY AS TO THE COST OF RAILROAD MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Of the expenditure for the transportation of the mails about $45,000,000 a year is for carriage on railroads at rates based on the weights carried. About $4,700,000 a year in addition is paid for the use of railway post-office cars. The fundamental law under which adjustments are made was passed in 1873. The rates then fixed have been reduced from time to time by acts of Congress and by order of the Postmaster-General. Congress reduced the rates for transportation 10 per cent by the act of 1876, an additional 5 per cent by the act of 1878, and an additional 5 per cent for weights above 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds, and about 5.2 per cent for weights above 48,000 pounds by the act of 1907, which also reduced the pay for railway post-office car service. The effect of the Postmaster-General's order of June 7, 1907, requiring the use of the full number of days in the weighing period as a divisor for obtaining the average daily weights of the mails, was to reduce the compensation for railroad mail transportation between 8 and 10 per cent. The act of 1876 provides that land-grant railroads shall be compensated at 80 per cent of the usual rate.

Upon investigation it will be found that we pay the railroads more for carrying the mails than the express companies charge for carrying freight or packages.

These are the matters that should and do merit the attention of those disposed to criticise the Members of Congress and untruthfully allege that the use of the franking privilege by Members in any way contributes to or causes the present large deficit in the Post-Office Department. It is time for the people to know the truth and not be misled by misinformation or untruthful statements.

Now, it is not fair or true, on the contrary, it is bearing false witness to the country, to say that this great deficit of some seventeen millions of dollars of expense incurred by the Government in handling the mail is due to the franking privilege used by the Members of Congress. For instance, I find free congressional "franks," $518,385.45; free departmental "penalty," $5,219,661.45, making for mail "franked" by Members and sent out by the various departments, $5,738,046.10. So, of the nearly $6,000,000 which the Government pays for the transportation of frank and penalty mail matter, only one-tenth of that sum can be charged up to the Members of Congress for the use of the franking privilege in sending out official documents, official letters, seeds, and so forth—in effect sending out their letters, public documents, and the distribution of seeds to their constituents. I want to put these figures in the RECORD; to deny and dispute the information that has been spread broadcast over the country by newspapers and other persons interested in deceiving the people, that this great deficit in the Post-Office Department was due to the use of the franking privilege by Members of Congress, because such is not the fact.

Says the Postmaster-General in his last annual report in reference to the revenue and expense in the Post-Office Department:

The entire work was placed in the hands of a special committee directed to determine the best method of making the estimates and to prepare them. The final report of the committee was submitted in November, 1909, and presents estimates of revenue and cost based on the postal receipts and the total expenditures on account of the postal establishment for the fiscal year 1908, as follows:

Revenue, expense, and profit or loss for the several classes of mail and the registry, money-order, and special-delivery services.

Item.	Revenue.	Expense.	Profit.	Loss.
Classes of mail:
First	$132,304,844.51	$78,630,649.89	$53,674,194.62

Total deficit				19,253,092.63

* Fees only.

From this it will be seen that the great loss was sustained in the carrying and handling through the mails of second-class matter, to wit, a loss of nearly $65,000,000, nearly $59,000,000 more of loss to the Government for carrying second-class matter than is paid for carrying all the official mail of the Government, including that carried under the franks of the Members of Congress, Senators and Representatives. Why, I know instances where iron letter boxes have been sent through the mails by the government officials, when it was cheaper to send by express. The Members of Congress are not chargeable for any great expense upon the Government in the use of the mail by exercise of the franking privilege. One-tenth only of this sum is chargeable to them. I apprehend that if an investigation were made of the circumstances where any Member of Congress had abused this privilege, it would be found that instances were very rare indeed, and wherever it may be done, and the frank had not been properly used, it had been franked on the idea that the Member had the right to frank it under the law, and it was the decision of some post-office official construing a regulation of that department. Take the Members franking the labels for the distribution of seeds and documents. They were held up in the post-office here at Washington. Mine were not, because mine were sent by express and as baggage. I received a circular notice from the Agricultural Department saying that it had been informed by the postmaster of this office that numbers of franks of Members which were upon labels for the distribution of seed were held in the post-office for postage under a ruling that these were not frankable.

It is a construction which, in my judgment, is not authorized by law. It is simply authorized by a regulation of the Post-Office Department, and if it is a correct construction and a proper regulation of the post-office, the Post-Office Committee, it occurs to me, ought to have corrected it by an amendment to this bill, because neither the documents nor seeds which are allotted to the Members can be distributed unless they bear the properly addressed labels, and to compel the Members to pay postage would put upon them an expense never contemplated they should incur when they are simply discharging an official duty to their constituents, and it is an expense that I am sure our constituents would not require of us.

As a Member of the House, who has been here for fifteen years and watched the course of Members closely, I am satisfied that these widely circulated charges of the general abuse by Members are utterly unfounded and that the instances of such abuse have been very rare, indeed.

I call the attention of the House and of the country to this subject for the purpose of showing that the largest portion of the mail matter which the Government sends through the mail, for which it pays $5,700,000, is not chargeable to Members of Congress, but is properly chargeable to the departments for sending out the official mail, and what is required to be done by them I apprehend in the proper discharge of their duties to the people of the country. There may be abuses in this regard, but let the blame fall on the proper officials, and not improperly be charged up to the Representatives of the people.

The Post-Office Department was not intended or proposed to be a money-making institution, nor established for such a purpose. It was intended and established, and should be now maintained, for the purpose of carrying the mails for the convenience of the people who pay the taxes to carry on the Government. The franking privilege granted to Members of Congress has not been abused and has not increased the deficiencies of this service. You realize that when you take into consideration the fact that the amount which it costs to carry the official correspondence of Members, the official documents which they send out, and the seeds which they distribute, is only one-tenth of the amount for carrying the mails free for Members and government officials.

I have said this much as a matter of justice to the Members of Congress, so that the country may understand, from the official figures presented by the Postmaster-General, how absurd and false these charges are, and for the purpose of setting them at rest and repelling the flippant slander so freely circulated on this subject. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

And the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon that paragraph.

Mr. WEEKS. That paragraph was in last year's bill. I do not know its previous history.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph is exactly similar to one that went out on a point of order in the case of clerks, and also in the case of carriers. The purpose of it was to interfere with the automatic promotions of railway mail clerks and to require the department to keep within the sum appropriated, although under the automatic-promotion system it might create a deficiency. I will ask the gentleman, Is the amount appropriated herein sufficient to provide for the clerks named?

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois understand that railway mail clerks are under the classification act of 1907?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they are in the classification of 1907. I do not think they are, but they are in a classification act which provides for automatic promotions. I will not undertake to say which act it is, because I do not recall. They have been increased. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] a moment ago referred to a railway mail clerk who received $600 a year.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Six hundred and some odd.

Mr. MANN. The least that a man receives when he enters the service, as I understand, is $800 a year, and that is only for six months. His salary is then increased to $900.

I did not know whether there was any special reason in this case for having this provision in the bill. If there is not, I will make the point of order against it.

Mr. WEEKS. In this and the preceding paragraph the committee adopted the recommendations of the department, including the number of clerks required for the service, the promotions, and the amount of money to carry on the service; in other words, it has not changed the estimates made by the department.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to suggest that I have frequently asked the Post-Office Department for additional clerks in some growing communities in a district which I have the honor to represent, and have been often informed that there was no provision, that the appropriation had been exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Then I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the department was stringing him, because there has been no recent year when they did not have additional clerks authorized by law at the end of the year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I have been frequently strung, and I thought the department was dealing squarely with me. I will investigate. I wondered if this bill provides for the ordinary exigencies that arise in the service. It ought to, in view of this very ironclad provision.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Speaking of stringing——

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw that remark. I do not wish to get into a controversy about it, because I have the greatest respect for the Post-Office Department, and I think they endeavor to do the correct thing as far as they can.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have frequently tried to secure an increase of the salaries of clerks and assistant postmasters, and have been told that on account of the lack of appropriation it would be impossible to give the assistant postmaster half the amount that was given the postmaster. Was I strung at that time?

Mr. MANN. The information furnished by the Post-Office Department to Members of the House sounds to me very much like the information which Members of the House often furnish to their constituents as an excuse for their inability to secure the passage of bills, when they lay the blame upon the Speaker of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I never accused the Speaker of anything of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the Speaker or some committee; we are prone to do that; but I apprehend that this item is in the bill simply because it was in the bill last year.

Mr. WEEKS. The committee believed it was a good limitation to place on the department. I do not think any great irregularity will be developed if it goes out on a point of order, and I am not going to take the time to oppose it if the gentleman from Illinois wishes to make the point of order. I believe it is a suitable limitation to be in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I believe the only purpose is to prevent the promotions provided by law which we have promised, and I therefore insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in addition to the salaries hereinbefore provided the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to make travel allowances, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum hereby appropriated, to railway postal clerks assigned to duty in railway post-office cars for expenses incurred by them while on duty, after twelve hours from the time of beginning their initial run, under such regulations as he may prescribe, and in no case shall such an allowance exceed 75 cents per day; and all the details pertaining to this service shall be reported to Congress not later than December 10, 1910; and for such travel allowances the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of offering an amendment, but the point of order had better be disposed of first.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make an inquiry of the chairman in regard to this matter. Upon what basis did the committee arrive at the conclusion it did, and what it intends to cover, in that part of the paragraph which says that all the details pertaining to this service shall be reported to Congress not later than the 10th of next December, when the provision is for the next fiscal year, which does not end for seven months after that time?

Mr. WEEKS. It will not be difficult for the Post-Office Department to report to Congress the methods it has adopted for the expenditure of this money. It is not the policy to pay for those clerks under this provision more than 75 cents a day. The reason for making that limitation is that the clerks have contended that $1 a day would be a fair traveling allowance. The Post-Office Committee does not wish to establish a precedent of paying for a midday meal in the postal service or in the government service, and therefore it places that limitation in this provision.

In addition the committee decided that those clerks who are at their own domiciles overnight, as many are, who get their own breakfast and evening meals at home, were not entitled to the same consideration as those who are away for a longer period, and for that reason the committee put in the limitation that the rate of compensation should commence twelve hours after the clerk leaves his domicile.

Now, the department will establish some method of procedure in this case. It is the purpose of the committee, which has been communicated to the department, that this money be expended for men who are away from home the longest time. When the department has carried out that policy, has made a statement of its method of carrying it out, then the committee and Congress will have information on which to increase or change the allowance if it seems advisable to do so.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a further question? This practically will cover all the railway mail clerks in the service?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. How many men in the service are there that do not work over twelve hours a day?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know how many that do not work sometimes twelve hours a day; they generally work a week on and a week off in the railway post-office cars. There are many clerks on short lines who are at home every night and get their breakfasts and evening meals at home. It is not the intention of the committee that this appropriation shall apply to those men.

Mr. MANN. But it does apply to them, nevertheless.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it does.

Mr. MANN. There are a few clerks who work every day in the year, except when they get annual leave. Most of the clerks, I judge over 90 per cent, work two weeks on and two weeks off.

Mr. WEEKS. One week on and one week off, to state it correctly.

Mr. MANN. That is correct; most of them work one week on and one week off. This item will apply to all of those clerks. I dare say there are a few cases where a man works one week on and one week off who does not work more than twelve hours a day the week that he is working. If he commences his run in the morning at 5 o'clock and goes out on a route and comes back and gets in so that the time is more than twelve hours from the time he started out, he gets the allowance, although he may be at home overnight.

Mr. WEEKS. If he did he would only get 25 cents a day.

Mr. MANN. Seventy-five cents a day.

Mr. WEEKS. Not to exceed 75 cents a day is the provision in the bill; and furthermore, the committee is well aware of the fact that $250,000 will not furnish sufficient money to pay all the clerks who are away from home longer than the time provided for in the appropriation, or the proportional part of that amount which they would be paid for the time they are away.

It is quite likely that more money will be required to carry out this provision following. The committee is not informed just how much money will be required for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to get some idea about that. How many postal clerks are there in the service?

Mr. WEEKS. About 16,000.

Mr. MANN. This would cost on an average close on to $150 a clerk.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, if the clerks were paid a dollar a day for all the time they are in the service away from their homes, nobody estimates that it would cost more than $1,800,000, and that would include clerks in apartment cars as well as those who serve in railway post-office cars.

Mr. MANN. That is what this practically does.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not think it does.

Mr. MANN. I am asking for information.

Mr. WEEKS. I am trying to give it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that he does not see that it does, but he does not explain the language in the bill. It says postal clerks assigned to duty in railway post-office cars after twelve hours from the time of beginning their initial runs shall receive not to exceed 75 cents a day. Certainly it is a very small number of clerks who do not exceed twelve hours a day from the time of the beginning of the run until the time of the end of the run, although they may have laid off several hours during the day.

Mr. WEEKS. That statement is simply an assertion on the part of the gentleman from Illinois, and it does not conform to any of the facts before the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman confines himself to denying an assertion. I have been familiar with the Railway Mail Service much longer than has the gentleman from Massachusetts, and if the gentleman will give us information that has been before his committee, very well, but it does not seem to me that it is sufficient for the chairman of a great committee to give no information in reference to a matter which he wishes to pass by unanimous consent. The gentleman has as yet given us no information as to how many clerks or what clerks would be covered by this provision.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the reason the chairman of the Post-Office Committee has not given that information is because the committee intends that this shall be an experimental service. It is not intended to limit the manner of expenditure of this money. It is left in the hands of the Post-Office Department to expend in those cases where men are away from their homes the longest time, the most needy cases, along the lines which we hope to follow in future; and the gentleman from Illinois will see in this provision, on line 10, "under such regulations as he may prescribe," that we have left in the hands of the department the method of the expenditure of this money and then have provided that the department shall report to Congress not later than December 10 of next year as to how the money has been expended, so that we may have information how to proceed wisely in future.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for information whether or not the expression "traveling allowance" has come in the departments to have a meaning which includes lodging and meals of anyone entitled to such an allowance. That seems to be accepted by the chairman of the committee, and if that is true I want to know it. Why should not the word "traveling" be stricken out? That is the point with me.

Mr. WEEKS. This allowance is called a traveling allowance in post-office appropriation bills. Men who are on the road are allowed a traveling allowance. That is simply the general phraseology.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It means board and lodging, does it?

Mr. WEEKS. In this case it is intended to give a man 75 cents a day after he has been away twelve hours and let him expend it as he wishes—at the rate of 75 cents a day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or any part of the 75 cents which the department may determine?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think I understand the matter, Mr. Chairman, as the chairman of the committee has stated, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not care what the gentleman from Kansas hopes. I will be glad to have his information, but his hopes do not cut any ice with me—with all due respect to my distinguished friend.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am aware that the gentleman from Illinois is in the habit of doing as he pleases in the House. But——

Mr. MANN. Now, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this proposition. Here is a proposition which theoretically purports to give to the railway mail clerks 75 cents a day when they are on their run more than twelve hours. That is theoretical. It will not do it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why?

Mr. MANN. It is a promise held out, no doubt, in good faith by the committee. I think there is grave doubt about the desirability of doing it at all, and I have always gone on the proposition if finally you do agree to promise to a man that you live up to your promise. The $250,000 will not begin to pay this traveling allowance between the end of this session of Congress and the beginning of the next session of Congress, and even if it did do it, there would still be a deficit. But it will not do that.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Did the gentleman say there was $150 to a man? I thought he did a while ago.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If every man in the service was entitled to 75 cents a day for every day in the year, it would amount to that; but it certainly can not be contended by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that every man in the postal service would be entitled to the 75 cents a day under the provision.

Mr. MANN. Ninety per cent of them will be entitled to it so far as dealing justly and evenly with them is concerned. If the intention is not to give them 75 cents a day, but only give them 25 cents or 35 cents a day, I believe in paying that. I do not believe in holding out to the railway mail clerk the supposition and promise of 75 cents a day, and then pretty soon, if the money runs short, not be able to collect the allowance.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words simply for one suggestion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose in this case to insist upon the point of order, because, although I think the committee in doing this has not given it the attention that it ought to receive, so far as they have done anything at all, it is a good step. So I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to make one comment.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I renewed the point of order for the purpose of getting an assurance that there will not be an attempt to increase the amount provided for in this paragraph. I have that assurance now, and I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] desired to offer an amendment.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Chairman, that when we make a promise we ought to keep it, but under present conditions I am perfectly willing if we can not get a whole loaf to accept half a loaf. I have stood all the way through, both in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and on the floor of this House, for economy, but I have never carried it either in the committee room or upon the floor of this House to the extent where I believed it would destroy the efficiency of the service. [Applause.] I will not do that.

Mr. Chairman, the RECORD shows that the first or second item in this bill is an item of $325,000 per diem pay for post-office inspectors. We pay a fair per diem of $4 per day to 300 post-office inspectors, thereby increasing their salaries one thousand and eighty-odd dollars per annum. It can not be found from the beginning to the end of this bill where a single man working in the interest of the Post-Office Department, and traveling in its interest, has not his expenses paid, except the railway post-office employees.

And in making a former amendment I said either the $4 per day was too much or else here was a much-neglected class of people who were entitled to a reasonable traveling pay. But we are assured, Mr. Chairman, that if a motion is made here to increase the amount a point of order will be made against it, and therefore I refrain from making the motion to increase the amount, because I know the item is subject to a point of order, and if a point of order is made against it the entire item will go out of the bill. This is a recognition, as was well said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and so well said by that venerable gentleman from the State of Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY], of the most valuable and trusted set of employees of all the 325,000 people working for the Post-Office Department.

The proof shows that the average salary of railway postal clerks is $1,165 per year. The proof shows that the average expenses of each one of these clerks is $133.19 per year; that the average net salary to each railway postal clerk is $1,036.08, approximately the same salary that the letter carriers get for working eight hours in the delivery of the mail in the cities, a less amount of salary than the clerks get for working in the majority of the post-offices in this country. Yet here is a class of people that in the year 1909 handled one billion two hundred and odd million pounds of mail, distributed it to the various centers and various places of delivery throughout the United States, yet up to the present time their merits have never been recognized in the matter of giving to them any travel allowance whatever. The proof shows scores upon scores of them every year either lose their lives or become crippled and incapacitated by reason of the perilous work in which they are engaged.

While I would have rejoiced to have seen $500,000 carried in this item, or a million dollars, as a token of recognition to pay a deserving class of people that heretofore have been entirely omitted from such benefit, I trust this work will go on and this travel pay will be extended until equal and exact justice is meted out to employees along this line. Too much credit can not be given to this class of employees. They are compelled to work in perilous places, and many of them soon meet an untimely death is some deadly wreck. Again, their work is so arduous and exacting that they are soon broken down and are compelled to retire and seek other employment. I hope to see Congress pass a law upon which appropriations can be based so that points of order will not be in order, and then a Member of this House will be in a position to offer any amendments he sees fit to offer. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I should have liked to offer an amendment to this paragraph, increasing this allowance from 75 cents to $1. But I find myself in the same category as the gentleman from Indiana, under duress under the threat of the gentleman from Arkansas that he will insist upon the point of order. Like the gentleman from Indiana, I prefer half a loaf to no bread; but I frankly state that that 75 cents a day, given for this purpose to the class of men who render such service, looks like an insult. We know that they will not get even three meals a day for that, to say nothing of lodging, although it may be a violent presumption that the railway mail clerk will need any lodging and will want to sleep while away from home. A great deal has been said about the average that it costs the railway mail clerks of the United States for expenses annually. I want to call your attention to some figures, that show not only the cost, but the gross inequality in wages, that is worked by the present discrimination against the railway mail clerk, a discrimination practiced against no other branch of the government service, requiring them to pay all their expenses out of their own pockets.

I hold in my hand a little pamphlet giving the total expenses on all runs in the seventh Railway Mail Service district, which comprises the States of Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, and New Mexico. It contains a table, which was carefully compiled, as I am reliably informed, and it shows that the expenses range annually from nothing to $306. And I find that in my own district in the State of Colorado is located the mail run in which the annual expense is $306. The wages of these mail clerks are nine, ten, and eleven hundred dollars a year, and many of them have to support a family after taking out an annual expense of two or three hundred dollars. This works an inequality in wages of from 25 to 30 per cent between the clerk on one run and another performing an identical service in another portion of the district where there is no expense incurred for food and lodging while away from home.

Mr. WEEKS. May I call the attention of the gentleman from Colorado to the fact that in these long, expensive runs, generally speaking, the clerks drawing the highest salaries perform the service? And it is the purpose of the committee that this 75 cents shall be apportioned and applied to such cases as that which he describes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of future information for this House, I would like the permission of the House to include in my remarks this table that I hold in my hand, and to which I have referred, showing the inequality that has been effected in the wages of the mail clerks by requiring them to pay their travel expenses, and which specifies class 3, or $1,100 clerks.

The statement and table are as follows:

The average pay of the postal clerk is $1,152 per year, and out of this amount he is required to pay his expenses, which average $131.40 per annum. The amount of this expense to the individual is determined largely by the number of hours spent away from home and by the section of the country in which the clerk runs. Clerks of the same class (as class 3, at $1,100 per annum) are paid the same wage the country over. But, for the reasons above mentioned, the expenses of the clerks vary greatly. A clerk may be detailed to office duty and be at home at all times. He may be assigned to a short run and be at home every night and for most of his meals. He may be on a long run, extending over several days and nights, or he may be on a run in a section of the country where living is high. But wherever he runs, or whatever the conditions, the clerk of class 3, out of his pay of $1,100 per year, must pay all of his expenses while away from home attending to the duties of his appointment. The same is true for the clerks of the other classes. They may receive more or less pay than the clerk of class 3, but out of this pay must come the expenses while away from home.

In order to show the great difference that exists, I insert a statement of the expenses of the clerks of the seventh Railway Mail Service division, a division composed of the States of Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, and New Mexico. This statement was made by a clerk upon each line named, or by a clerk upon a connecting line, and is substantially correct:

This will show that 1,199 clerks spend $13,276 per month, or $159,312 per year.

Average per clerk per year, $132.87.

Total for clerks on road duty in United States, $1,836,793.56.

Average per clerk in United States yearly, $131.40.

It will be noticed that some of these men are at no expense whatever, and have for the use of themselves and their families the full amount of the wage provided by law. Others are at an expense ranging from $44.80 to $306 per year, which amount must be deducted from the wage provided by law. It does not cost the class 3 clerk on the Salina and McPherson a cent to earn his $1,100. It costs the class 3 clerk on the Ridgeway and Durango $306 per year to earn his $794.

The only way in which this inequality can be remedied is by the payment by the Government of the necessary expenses of the clerks while away from their initial terminal. In no other way can the clerks (and their families), regardless of where they run, have an equal amount at the end of the year.

The Railway Mail Service and the Post-Office Committee are to be congratulated upon the first step, as taken in this bill, to remedy the gross iniquities disclosed by that table, and it is to be sincerely hoped that for the first time a point of order will not be pressed against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 22, by striking out, beginning with line 4, all down to and including the word "ten," in line 14, and insert the following:

"That on and after the 1st day of July, 1910, the Postmaster-General, under such regulations as he may prescribe, may make a travel allowance in lieu of actual expenses to each railway postal clerk who is assigned to duty in a railway post-office, at the rate of 25 cents for each meal and lodging, which, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, may be necessary for said railway postal clerk while he is traveling on duty away from his home and the initial point of his run, but such allowance shall not exceed a dollar for any period of twenty-four hours."

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, this is a new amendment, it seems, to this bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Why, certainly. It does not increase the $250,000.

Mr. MACON. And seems to be subject to the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. I am willing for the gentleman to make it; but I do not think it is.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas reserves the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that I thought I had his word that there would be no attempt to increase this appropriation.

Mr. FINLEY. That is true. This does not increase the appropriation. If the gentleman will observe the reading of the amendment, it does not affect the appropriation of $250,000 at all.

Mr. MACON. It does not affect the lump sum, but it does increase the amount to be paid out by the Postmaster-General to $1 per day, at least.

Mr. FINLEY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas is mistaken. If he will turn to page 39 of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's report, he will see that this whole matter is in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and so is the provision which is in the bill. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas is entirely mistaken. My amendment does not increase the amount appropriated for the purpose of carrying out this proposed new law at all, and I will say to the gentleman that what is in the bill now is entirely insufficient to pay in full all that is stated in the provision. It will require from a million and a quarter to a million and a half dollars to carry out what is in the bill, and for this year we only propose to appropriate $250,000, so my amendment proposes two things—first, to make permanent law a provision which is in the bill that is only temporary in its character; it is not permanent law and will not be permanent law when enacted, and I propose the recommendation which is carried in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's report and which, if enacted, will be permanent law.

I would rather have the permanent law, and I stated frankly to the gentleman, as I have before privately and otherwise, here and elsewhere, that I do not propose to ask for an increase of this item of $250,000, so that I have entirely and fully conformed to what I have said, so far as I am concerned and so far as I believe, that this amount of $250,000 will not be increased.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from South Carolina can assure me that there is no difference between 75 cents and a dollar, then he can satisfy me that there will not be any increase in this appropriation. [Applause.] But he must show me that there is no difference between 75 cents and a dollar before I can see it as he does.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say this to the gentleman, that this whole matter is left in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and he will only pay it to the people who, in his judgment and discretion, are best entitled to it. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars will not carry out the provision which is here on page 22 of the post-office appropriation bill, beginning with line 4 and ending with line 16.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if he never heard of a deficiency in an appropriation by reason of a department attempting to pay every demand that was made upon it, and in that way exceeding the appropriation for the department?

Mr. FINLEY. And let me ask the gentleman if he has read line 14, on page 22, these words:

> And for such travel allowances the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Arkansas does not seem to have caught the meaning of my statement that this $250,000 will not carry out the purpose for which it is intended by over a million dollars.

Mr. MACON. What is to become of the rest of it?

Mr. FINLEY. The Postmaster-General will, in his discretion, make such rules and regulations as will only call for the expenditure of $250,000 next year. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MACON. Can the gentleman assure me that he has that information from the department?

Mr. FINLEY. I assure the gentleman that here is the provision in the bill, and the Postmaster-General can not go beyond it.

Mr. MACON. My dear sir, we passed a law here a few years ago that absolutely made it illegal for the head of a department to expend any more than was appropriated in an annual appropriation bill for the conduct of the affairs of that department, and the gentleman knows that they have exceeded that authority in every instance.

Mr. FINLEY. Not in every instance. I will assure the gentleman that under this provision in this bill the Postmaster-General can not expend more than $250,000 next year. I make that statement.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman says this will not provide for a quarter of the amount.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not think it will provide for a fifth of it.

Mr. CLINE. Does not the gentleman think the postal clerks ought to have the benefit of the information obtained by the committee that investigated this matter?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say that the matter was investigated by the committee. I am a member of the committee, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. CLINE. The beneficiaries of this appropriation will discover that there is some uncertainty as to who shall have the benefit of it. Now, the committee must have taken into consideration certain circumstances and conditions under which this money should be expended. Would it not be a proper matter of information for the railway postal clerks to have, in order to show how the committee arrived at this amount?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that so far as the discretion of the Postmaster-General is concerned, and in so far as he is required to make rules and regulations, there is no difference between the provision in the bill and in the amendment. He must make rules and regulations for carrying out this provision of law within the limits of the appropriation of $250,000 for the next year.

Mr. CLINE. I am not objecting to that, but I supposed that the committee arrived at some conclusion, under what circumstances this money was to be paid out, inasmuch as they could not appropriate for the whole of it.

Mr. FINLEY. The committee knew, and every man in this House is bound to know, that $250,000 will not cover the whole amount. The committee could not formulate rules and regulations. They could not provide by law how much should be paid to each man. What we did was to make a general provision, and then provide an amount of money, which, in my judgment, will not be 18 per cent of what the full expenditure would be if the law were carried out completely.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The paying of the money is solely a matter of administration, is it not?

Mr. FINLEY. That is solely a matter of administration, and the Postmaster-General is required to formulate rules and regulations; and he can not expend more than $250,000 whether the provision in the bill remains or whether the amendment which I have offered is carried. That makes no difference. When a man is absent from home, say, for only one meal, he is not bound to give that man anything if, in his judgment, he thinks he should not have it, as compared with other people who are away from home a longer period.

Now, I will say that this class of people is comparatively small, anyway. It is estimated that anywhere from $15,000 to $25,000, even if you pay that class who would only be absent one meal from home, would be sufficient. That is the best opinion I can get, and I say that the Postmaster-General could not spend one cent more in the administration of this proposed law in the bill or by my amendment than $250,000 in the next fiscal year.

But I may as well be fair, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the time will come when of necessity this appropriation will be increased. The time will come when Congress, in the exercise of its sound discretion and judgment, will appropriate more than $250,000, because that sum will only pay a very few of these 15,000 or 16,000 clerks in the railway postal service their expense account; or if you would pay pro rata, it would be a very small percentage to each one of these clerks.

So that the principal point of distinction between the provision in the bill and the amendment is that the provision in the bill is of a temporary character and will only pay for the next fiscal year, while the amendment I offer will be permanent law. Now, I ask those who are in favor of doing justice to this large, laboring, faithful, highly efficient class of public servants, if they wish to do something that will benefit them, that will be of a permanent benefit and not a temporary benefit, to vote for the amendment offered by me, and then they will be carrying out their wishes in the premises.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I had the point of order reserved on the paragraph in the bill, and the gentleman from South Carolina assured me that there would be no attempt to change this paragraph if I would withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist that I made no such statement to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MACON. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. FINLEY. I said the appropriation would not be increased.

Mr. MACON. Then there was certainly a mistake about the matter.

Mr. FINLEY. I want to say that I did not make the mistake on my part.

Mr. MACON. I do not know what the gentleman means when he says he did not make the mistake, for he assured me that if I would withdraw it there would be no increase.

Mr. FINLEY. I made no effort to increase it.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman made an effort to increase it in this way, providing $1 a day instead of 75 cents, and also proposed to make it permanent law.

Mr. FINLEY. I did attempt to make it permanent law; that is what I want to do.

Mr. MACON. If the gentleman can afford to do that when he said that he would make no change, all right.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman can afford to stand up there and say that I did violate my agreement, then he can make the best of it. I only stated to the gentleman that there would be no increase in the appropriation of $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FINLEY) there were—ayes 20, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For acting clerks, in place of clerks or substitutes injured while on duty, and to enable the Postmaster-General to pay the sum of $1,000, which shall be exempt from payment of debts of the deceased, to the legal representatives of any railway postal clerk or substitute railway postal clerk who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as the result of such injury, $100,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MANN. I will gladly yield for that purpose.

The motion of Mr. WEEKS was agreed to; and accordingly the committee determined to rise, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill (H. R. 21419) and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BURGESS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two weeks on account of important business.

Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for four days on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Bridgeport Harbor, Connecticut (H. Doc. No. 751)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of George N. L. Buyers, administrator of estate of Nelson M. Buyers, against The United States (H. Doc. No. 749)—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the Missouri River at or near Lake Contrary, Missouri (H. Doc. No. 750)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Saco River, Maine (H. Doc. No. 752)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 21904) to authorize the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus lands after allotment, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 692), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHEFFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 19285) to amend section 773 of the Revised Statutes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 678), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 21760) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at Bemidji, in the State of Minnesota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 679), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 6229) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak., by the Yankton, Norfolk and Southern Railway Company, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 680), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. Res. 398) requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit a statement of all lands and buildings leased by the Government in the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 687), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4747) for the relief of the board of education of the Harpers Ferry school district of Jefferson County, W. Va., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 681), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 9564, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 483) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of the heirs of John Fornea, accompanied by a report (No. 683), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MORSE, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred House bill 17456, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 484) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of Luster P. Chester and Freeland Chester, executors of Thomas R. Chester, accompanied by a report (No. 684), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred House bill 17660, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 485) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of Mary J. McGlothlen, accompanied by a report (No. 685), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 22218, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 486) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of Mary A. Haney and Clarence E. Haney, accompanied by a report (No. 686), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 5375, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 487) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of W. H. Francis, accompanied by a report (No. 688), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 5430, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 488) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of Mumford Smith, executor of James H. Cecil, deceased, accompanied by a report (No. 689), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 22190, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 489) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of the heirs of Joseph Hemmerback, deceased, accompanied by a report (No. 690), which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18761) granting relief to the estate of Patrick H. Handley, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 691), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MORSE, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17802) for the relief of Harrison Wagner, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 682), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14401) granting an increase of pension to Harvey Johnson—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20416) granting a pension to Ruth E. Dietz—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURGESS: A bill (H. R. 22370) to build a post-office at Bay City, Tex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 22371) to build a post-office at Cuero, Tex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 22372) to build a post-office at Yoakum, Tex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GARDNER of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 22373) for the erection of a post-office building at Albion, Mich.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KENDALL: A bill (H. R. 22374) for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Colfax, Iowa—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GARNER of Texas: A bill (H. R. 22375) to build a post-office at Uvalde, Tex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 22376) to build a post-office at Beeville, Tex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 7, 1910.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. GALLINGER called the Senate to order and directed the Secretary to read a communication from the President pro tempore of the Senate, which was read as follows:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
March 7, 1910.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I hereby appoint JACOB H. GALLINGER to perform the duties of the Chair.

WM. P. FRYE, President pro tempore.

Mr. GALLINGER thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed the Secretary to read the Journal.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. WARREN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference requested by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXCISE BOARD OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1692) to increase the efficiency of the veterinary service of the army, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 332) thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1023) to increase the efficiency of the veterinary service of the army, to report it unfavorably, as the subject-matter is contained in the bill just reported. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16824) for the relief of Daniel H. Wiggin, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 333) thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3257) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 334) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4503) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, savings banks, trust companies, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 335) thereon.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 11878) to change the name of Twenty-third street north of Calvert street, in the District of Columbia, to Woodley place (Report No. 336);

A bill (H. R. 13893) to authorize the extension of Forty-first street NW. (Report No. 337);

A bill (H. R. 16915) to direct that Jefferson street NW., between Fourteenth street and Colorado avenue, be stricken from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia (Report No. 338);

A bill (H. R. 19785) to authorize the extension of Columbia road NW., in the District of Columbia (Report No. 339);

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN STATES.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report a joint resolution authorizing the use of a United States army transport for certain purposes, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 83) authorizing the use of a United States army transport for certain purposes was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a United States transport to convey from New York to Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic, the delegates and their assistants, appointed under the authority of the urgent deficiency act, approved February 25, 1910, to represent the United States at the Fourth International Conference of American States, which is to convene in Buenos Aires on July 9, 1910: Provided, That the total expense thus incurred shall not exceed $45,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Wyoming?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARY F. SWINDELL.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 196), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 196.

Resolved, That the bill (S. 6729) entitled "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary F. Swindell," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

COURT OF COMMERCE, ETC.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I had permission, when I reported the bill (S. 6737) to create a court of commerce and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes, to submit a written report at a later day. I now submit the report of the majority of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The minority views of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] are also on the Clerk's desk, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is to submit his views; and I ask that all three be printed together in a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, right in this connection I wish to offer a minority report with reference to the bill to which the Senator from West Virginia has referred. I understand that this, with the minority views of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota, will be printed with the report of the majority——

Mr. ELKINS. Together.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As a public document; and there is a standing order that they all be printed in the RECORD. I imagine the order will be the majority report, the views of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and then my own.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he thinks it is necessary to print these reports in the RECORD?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that it has already been so ordered. It was ordered the other day.

Mr. GALLINGER. That they be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. When they were all three presented, then they were all to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ELKINS. They are presented now.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that is so, I certainly shall not object, although I think we are getting quite in the habit of lumbering up the RECORD with all kinds of material.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was ordered the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the three reports will be printed as a public document and also printed in the RECORD.

The majority report and views of the minority are as follows:

[Senate Report No. 355, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

REPORT TO ACCOMPANY S. 6737.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which were referred the bills (S. 5106, S. 6737) to create a court of commerce, and amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes, having considered the same, reports herewith the bill S. 6737 and recommends its adoption.

Your committee recommends that the bill S. 5106 be indefinitely postponed.

The bill reported provides for the creation of a new court to be known as the "court of commerce," and makes certain amendments to the acts relating to interstate commerce, as to which the committee begs leave to submit the following considerations:

COURT OF COMMERCE.

Every carrier affected by an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission has a constitutional right to appeal to a court to protect it from the enforcement of the order, where it appears from the presentation of the facts by the carrier that the effect of the order will be to deprive it of a reasonable return upon its invested capital, and, therefore, to amount to a taking of property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of Articles V and XIV of the Constitution, or to unjustly discriminate against the carrier (Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466); and as this right may now be exercised in any one of the courts of the United States, not only does much delay result in the final observance of the orders of the commission, but considerable contrariety of decision, with resulting uncertainty in the law. The only way to effectively meet this condition is by concentrating the judicial review of orders of the commission in one court so organized as to be able to deal speedily and effectively with the questions presented.

The principal argument in favor of the creation of such a court is that it will prevent delay and confusion in the enforcement of the law by creating one tribunal specially versed in the complicated and often technical questions arising out of the application of the interstate-commerce law to railroads and other carriers subject to the act. To meet the objection that such court would become more like a board or commission by reason of being confined to dealing in one special class of subjects, and having its sessions generally in the city of Washington, it is provided that the court be composed of circuit judges of the United States, designated to sit in the commerce court for periods of five years, the term of designation of one of such judges expiring in each year, thus drawing in from the general body of the judiciary every year a judge who has been dealing with general questions of jurisprudence, and at the same time preserving in the court a continuity of personnel and the technical knowledge and experience gained by continued service in the court. In order that the judicial force of the country may be large enough to meet these requirements, provision is made in the bill for the appointment of five additional circuit judges, who shall be designated to sit in the court of commerce in the first instance, and whose successors, as the periods of original designation expire, shall be from time to time designated by the Chief Justice of the United States.

Chairman Knapp, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, has testified that he regards the creation of such a tribunal as the commerce court as highly important.

"There are many reasons which bring me to that conclusion. The rather fundamental reason is grounded in that fact that these are all questions of national scope and interest. They are in no sense the local and isolated questions which arise in the ordinary courts. It is important that there be a tribunal of first instance which shall pass upon all these questions, so that the determination will be harmonious and consistent, not, as it is now, uncertain and conflicting in different parts of the country."

He further testified that such a court would obviate the great delays now experienced, even with the aid of the Expedition Act; that while the recent decisions of the Supreme Court in the Car Distribution cases (215 U. S., 452, 481) had perhaps lessened the need of such a court, still the experience of the commission had shown that the greater part of the cases arising would not turn upon questions of judgment and discretion, but upon construction of the law, the authority of the commission, and the question of confiscation; that out of 31 cases, most of which had been brought within the past year and a half, and a majority within the last year, 24 would not have been affected by the recent cases, because based upon construction of the statutes or the contention that the commission had exceeded its authority independently of the question of judgment and discretion. Judge Knapp further explained that as the commission had made no very important orders of large effect upon revenues of railroads for perhaps a year or a year and a half, and not many for two years or more after the passage of the Hepburn Act (approved June 30, 1906), most of these cases had been brought during the last year.

The bill gives to the court of commerce exclusive original jurisdiction over all cases of the following kinds:

(1) For the enforcement otherwise than by adjudication and collection of a forfeiture or a penalty or by infliction of criminal punishment of any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission other than for the payment of money.

(2) Proceedings to enjoin, set aside, annul, suspend in whole or in part any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(3) Such cases as by section 3 of the Elkins Act, approved February 19, 1903, may be maintained or authorized to be maintained in a circuit court of the United States.

(4) Such mandamus proceedings as under sections 20 or 23 of the interstate-commerce act are authorized to be maintained in a circuit court of the United States.

1. The first group of cases comprises such as section 16 of the existing interstate-commerce law, as amended by section 10 of the new bill, authorizes in this language:

"If any carrier fails or neglects to obey any order of the commission other than for the payment of money while the same is in effect, any party injured thereby, or the United States, by its Attorney-General, may apply to the court of commerce for enforcement of such order."

The existing section 16, apart from the amendment by the new bill, authorizes such action to be taken in the circuit courts. The amendment in section 10 of the new bill provides, like the existing section, that if the court determines "that the order was regularly made and duly served, and that the carrier is in disobedience of the same, the court shall enforce obedience to such order by writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to restrain such carrier, its officers, agents, or representatives, from further disobedience of such order, or to enjoin upon it or them obedience to the same."

Prior to the enactment of the Hepburn Act of 1906, the orders of the commission were generally enforced by proceedings under section 16. Since the passage of that act, in view, probably, of the severe penalties imposed for violation of its provisions, orders of the commission have been either obeyed or challenged by suits in the courts, but the provision may be availed of at any time, and is believed to be a valuable adjunct in the enforcement of the law.

2. The "cases brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement" of the commission, suggested as the second group of cases within the jurisdiction of the court of commerce, are such as section 16 of the existing act sanctions, in the following language:

"The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States against the commission to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office, and may be brought at any time after such order is promulgated; and if the order or requirement has been made against two or more carriers, then in the district where any one of said carriers has its principal operating office; and if the carrier has its principal operating office in the District of Columbia, then the venue shall be in the district where said carrier has its principal office; and jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits is hereby vested in such courts. The provision of 'An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity, and so forth,' approved February 11, 1903, shall be, and are hereby, made applicable to all such suits, including the hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction, and are also made applicable to any proceeding in equity to enforce any order or requirement of the commission, or any of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto. It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General in every such case to file the certificate provided for in said expediting act of February 11, 1903, as necessary to the application of the provisions thereof; and upon appeal as therein authorized to the Supreme Court of the United States, the case shall have in such court priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes: Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the commission. An appeal may be taken from any interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided further, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court over all other causes, except causes of like character and criminal causes."

This language is omitted in the amendment of section 16 by section 10 of the new bill, because the cases are transferred by the bill to the court of commerce, and the procedure concerning interlocutory injunctions in such cases is now regulated by section 3 of the new bill, and appeals in such cases are regulated by section 2 of the new bill. Attention is particularly called to the fact that section 9 of the new bill, amending section 15 of the existing act, retains the following language:

"All orders of the commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than thirty days, and shall continue in force for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the commission, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the commission, or be suspended or set aside by the court of competent jurisdiction."

The proper court is now indicated both by the general grant of jurisdiction in section 1 of the new bill and also by the first sentence of section 3 of the new bill, providing that—

"suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the commission shall be brought in the court of commerce against the United States."

The phraseology of the new bill on this subject of enjoining, setting aside, annulling, or suspending an order of the commission follows the plan of the existing law. That fact, and especially the sentence just quoted from section 9 of the new bill, repeating in that respect section 15 of the existing law to the effect that all orders of the commission shall take effect and go into operation unless they are "suspended or modified or set aside" by the court of commerce, makes it manifest that the scope of review of the commission's orders in the court of commerce will not be wider than it is now in the circuit courts under the recent decision in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central Railroad Company (215 U. S., 452). The fundamental ruling of that case is to the effect that under existing statutes the courts can consider only these questions:

"(a) All relevant questions of constitutional power or right; (b) all pertinent questions as to whether the administrative order is within the scope of the delegated authority under which it purports to have been made; and (c) a proposition which we state independently, although in its essence it may be contained in the previous one, viz, whether, even although the order be in form within the delegated power, nevertheless it must be treated as not embraced therein, because the exertion of authority which is questioned has been manifested in such an unreasonable manner as to cause it in truth to be within the elementary rule that the substance and not the shadow determines the validity of the exercise of the power." (Per White, 5, at p. 470.)

The court's conclusion was reached largely in consequence of the language quoted from section 15 of the existing act and repeated in the new bill, which puts the orders of the commission into effect and continues them in force unless suspended by a court, and also because of the fact that courts ought not to be endowed with merely administrative powers such as are involved in the exercise of the commission's discretion. Both reasons support the conclusion that the court of commerce would be limited, under the new bill, in its review of the commission's orders just as the circuit courts now are.

3. The third group of cases over which the court of commerce is by the bill given jurisdiction consists of those which by section 3 of the Elkins Act (approved Feb. 19, 1903) are authorized to be maintained in a circuit court. These cases may be described, without quotation of the full section, as suits to compel observance of the published tariffs of a railroad (either by mandatory injunction or by injunction against allowance of other than the tariff rates) and suits to enjoin discrimination.

4. The last group of cases contains such as arise under a portion of section 20 of the existing act and under section 23 of that act, which read, respectively, as follows:

"That the circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney-General of the United States at the request of the commission, alleging a failure to comply with or a violation of any of the provisions of said act to regulate commerce or of any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of said acts, or any of them. (Part of sec. 20.)

"SEC. 23. That the circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction upon the relation of any person or persons, firm, or corporation alleging such violation by a common carrier of any of the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement and all acts amendatory thereof as prevents the relator from having interstate traffic moved by said common carrier at the same rates as are charged, or upon terms or conditions as favorable as those given by said common carrier for like traffic under similar conditions to any other shipper, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus against said common carrier, commanding such common carrier to move and transport the traffic, or to furnish cars or other facilities for transportation for the party applying for the writ: Provided, That if any question of fact as to the proper compensation to the common carrier for the service to be enforced by the writ is raised by the pleadings, the writ of peremptory mandamus may issue, notwithstanding such question of fact is undetermined, upon such terms as to security, payment of money into the court, or otherwise, as the court may think proper, pending the determination of the question of fact: Provided, That the remedy hereby given by writ of mandamus shall be cumulative, and shall not be held to exclude or interfere with other remedies provided by this act or the act to which it is a supplement."

It is claimed by some that there will not be enough business of the character over which jurisdiction is by the bill devolved upon the court of commerce to keep that tribunal occupied. On the other hand, the view is expressed by many that the volume of business will constantly increase, and that the classes of cases which by section 12 of the proposed act may be brought before the court will of themselves occupy much of its time. It is the opinion of a majority of the committee that there will be ample business to engage the attention of the court, but one of the advantages of constituting the court by designation from among the circuit judges is that in case at any time there should not be a sufficient volume of business falling within the jurisdiction of the commerce court to keep it occupied, the judges may be sent back to the circuits where there is the greatest need of judges, thus relieving that congestion of business in the circuits which is continually happening.

By section 2 final judgments or decrees of the court of commerce are made reviewable by the United States Supreme Court if appeal be taken within sixty days after the entry thereof, but such appeal shall not operate as a stay of the decree appealed from unless the Supreme Court or a justice thereof shall so direct.

It is further provided that suits to enjoin or set aside orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in the court of commerce against the United States, instead of against the Interstate Commerce Commission, as at present; that the pendency of such suit shall not itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the commission, but that the court in its discretion may grant such stay pending final hearing and determination on notice and after hearing, although a temporary stay may be granted by the court or a judge thereof for a period not exceeding sixty days.

The bill gives to the Attorney-General entire charge and control of the interests of the Government in all cases and proceedings in the court of commerce and in the Supreme Court on appeal from the court of commerce. This is a change from the existing law.

By section 3 of the act approved February 19, 1903 (Elkins Act), it is made the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, whenever the Attorney-General shall direct, either of his own motion or upon the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to institute and prosecute proceedings under that act. In Texas and Pacific Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S., 197) it was held that the commission was a body corporate, with legal capacity to be a party plaintiff or defendant in the federal courts. Suits to review or set aside orders of the commission are therefore brought against it eo nomine, and are defended under its direction by its own attorneys, under the nominal supervision of the Attorney-General. This practice has given rise to much criticism, as putting the commission in a controversial attitude with respect to matters in which its participation should be wholly of a judicial character. The bill terminates this condition by requiring all proceedings to review orders of the commission to be brought against the United States and by vesting the conduct of all such proceedings in the Department of Justice.

A suggestion has been pressed upon the consideration of the committee and has found favor with some. It is not only that the present system be continued—whereby the Interstate Commerce Commission, having investigated, after perhaps itself originating a complaint against a carrier, hearing and determining the complaint and making an order requiring action by the carrier, then becomes a litigant in the courts to defend its own proceedings, thus combining the functions of investigator, judge, and prosecutor—but that any shipper or other party who has been instrumental in promoting the inquiry or prosecution be allowed of right to intervene in the judicial proceedings brought to review the determination of the commission. In the opinion of your committee nothing could be more contrary to the correct theory of law or procedure. A proceeding before the commission is analogous to a hearing by a committee of Congress. The commission's order is in effect legislation. Prior to such order, in proceedings before the commission any complainant stands as a petitioner to Congress—seeking legislation.

But when the commission acts, the defense of its orders is a matter affecting not one or more particular interests, but one which affects the whole country, and the conduct of such matters should be vested where the conduct of all of the legal affairs of the Government is vested, namely, in the Department of Justice. To enact that any individual considering himself interested in sustaining the order of the commission may of right intervene in a suit brought in the court of commerce to review or set aside such an order, would introduce intolerable confusion in legal proceedings and subordinate the general interests of all the people to the selfish concerns of one or more parties whose special interests might be wholly at variance with the general public welfare. It would be impossible for the Attorney-General to discharge the duty of defending the interests of the Government if the conduct of the lawsuit were suffered to be complicated by one, or a dozen, or perhaps fifty intervening citizens, each advocating his own particular views, which might or might not harmonize with those of the counsel for the Government.

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CARRIERS.

Section 7 of the bill amends the fifth section of the interstate commerce act by providing that agreements between common carriers subject to the act specifying the classifications of freight, and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of freight and passengers agreed upon shall not be unlawful under the commerce act or under the Sherman antitrust act, if a copy of the agreement be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within twenty days after it is made;

but that all provisions of the commerce act shall be applicable to such agreements; and that any party to the agreement may withdraw from the same on thirty days' notice; and that the agreement in itself shall not be deemed a tariff or schedule of rates, etc., nor operate to alter any such; and that nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the making of agreements for pooling freight contrary to the provisions of section 5 of the commerce act.

The effect of this provision is to relieve carriers from the prohibition of the antitrust act as affecting agreements of the character referred to, while preserving unimpaired the control of the commission under the interstate commerce act over all such agreements. The provision is, in the opinion of a majority of your committee, in exact compliance with the declaration in the Republican platform of 1908, in the following language, viz:

"We believe, however, that the interstate commerce law should be further amended so as to give railroads the right to make and publish traffic agreements subject to the approval of the commission, but maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatever."

The contention that this declaration can only be complied with by requiring the approval of such agreements by the Interstate Commerce Commission before they become operative is, in the opinion of your committee, destitute of the slightest foundation. The right to make agreements "subject to the approval of the commission" is obviously a very different thing from the right to make agreements only with the previous approval of the commission. The section in question carefully preserves the principles so clearly enunciated in the platform, and only by a willful distortion of language could it be contended that this carefully guarded provision involved any abandonment of the principle of competition between naturally competing lines.

In order to prevent any misunderstanding on the subject, the section expressly declares that its provisions shall not be construed to legalize pooling agreements between carriers, which are expressly prohibited by section 5 of the interstate-commerce act.

OBLIGATION TO FURNISH ACCURATE QUOTATIONS.

Section 8 of the bill amends section 6 of the interstate-commerce act by requiring a railroad corporation subject to the act to furnish, on written request, a statement in writing of the rate or charge applicable to a described shipment between stated places under schedules or tariffs to which such company is a party; and in the event of a failure to furnish such information within a reasonable time, or of a misstatement, if the party making such request suffers actual damage in consequence of such misstatement or omission to answer, makes the carrier liable to a penalty of $250, to be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

In order that this clause may not give rise to petty and vexatious prosecutions where no injury has resulted from the failure to answer an inquiry, or the giving of erroneous information, the section requires some proof to be shown, not of the extent of damage suffered, but that some actual damage did result from the failure on the part of the carrier to comply with a request made for a stated rate.

To illustrate, a shipper may demand a rate, looking forward to the sale of material, which rate is furnished, and in which an error may occur, the shipper having failed to make a bid for the furnishing of said material, no injury has resulted to him, and under such circumstances no penalty should be imposed for the error in the quotation of the rate.

CLASSIFICATIONS.

Some doubt has been raised as to whether, under the provisions of section 15 of the existing act, the commission is empowered to review classifications of freight as well as rates, and to make orders dealing with improper classifications. (Judson on Interstate Commerce, edition of 1908, secs. 209, 210.) By section 9 of the bill this doubt is removed and the power is expressly vested in the commission.

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMISSION OF PROPOSED INCREASE IN RATES.

Under existing law the commission is only empowered to investigate the question whether or not a rate is unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential, or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of the act, upon a complaint made to the carrier under the provisions of section 13. (See Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 211 U. S., 407; 1 Drinker on Interstate Commerce, p. 395.) Such complaint can not be made and such inquiry initiated until the rate shall have become effective. During the period of investigation the carrier is allowed to collect the rate under investigation or to continue the practices complained of. It is true that by sections 13 and 16 a shipper who has paid a rate subsequently adjudged to be unreasonable may compel restitution by the carrier of the excessive rate paid; but in practice it is found that such restitution is but seldom sought or awarded, probably because the shipper generally recoups himself from the public for the amount of the loss through the augmented price of the commodity.

To meet this situation it has been contended by some that the commission should be empowered to postpone the date when a proposed increase in rates should become effective until it should complete an investigation into the reasonableness of the proposed increase; while on the other hand it is urged on behalf of the railroad companies that such action would bear unjustly upon the carriers, as, if at the termination of such investigation it should be found that the proposed increase was reasonable and proper, the carrier would have lost the entire benefit of the increase in rates during the period of investigation, without any means of reparation. A majority of the committee is of opinion that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be authorized to commence the investigation of a proposed increase in rate, or change in classification, as soon as it is filed with the commission, and that at any time before the rate or classification would become effective the commission should, in its discretion, be empowered, by order stating its reasons therefor, to postpone the effective date of such increase or classification for a reasonable period to enable it to investigate the proposed action.

The bill fixes this reasonable period at sixty days, thus giving the commission ninety days in all within which to complete its investigation—a length of time which can not possibly work any serious hardship to the railroad companies, and which, on the other hand, will afford the commission opportunity with due diligence to complete or, at all events, to make substantial headway in, any such investigation.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in a statement filed with your committee, recommends that this time be extended to one hundred and twenty days. Some of those who favor the principle of the enactment wish the commission to have the power of unlimited postponement. The power is a new one, and your committee feels that with due diligence the commission can within ninety days determine whether or not a proposed rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice should be approved.

THROUGH ROUTES AND THROUGH RATES.

The power of the commission to establish through routes and joint rates and to prescribe the division thereof, and so forth, is, under the existing law, wholly dependent upon there being no existing reasonable or satisfactory through route. If there be one, the commission has no power to require the establishment of any other.

By section 9 of the proposed act the commission is empowered, upon complaint or upon its own initiative, to establish such through routes whether there is any other existing satisfactory through route or not; so that, if two or more satisfactory through routes between designated points can be established, the commission is empowered to establish them. In the exercise of this power, however, the commission is prohibited from establishing any through route, classification, or rate between street, suburban, or interurban electric passenger railways not engaged in the general business of transporting freight in addition to their passenger and express business and railroads of a different character, for the reason that such electric railways would have neither the equipment nor the terminal or other facilities requisite to the proper handling of traffic passing over the line of a general railroad.

The action of the commission is further restricted by providing that in establishing such through route no company shall be required, without its consent, to embrace therein substantially less than the entire length of its railroad and of any intermediate railroad operating in conjunction and under a common management or control therewith which lies between the termini of such proposed through route, unless to do so would make such through route unreasonably long as compared with another practicable through route which could otherwise be established. It would seem to be unreasonable to empower the commission to require a railroad company having a line of its own between two designated termini to allow a portion only of that line to be taken and linked up with other lines for the purpose of creating another through route in competition with it, thus depriving it of the natural advantage of possessing a direct line between the termini, unless such line should happen to be so much longer than the proposed new through route as to make the establishment of such new route not merely an added convenience, but a public necessity.

THE SHIPPER'S RIGHT TO ROUTE SHIPMENTS.

It has been contended on behalf of a large number of shippers and shippers' associations that the shipper should be given the unqualified right to direct the routing of his own shipments. On the other hand, the railroad companies object to granting such right upon the ground that it would interfere with the systematic and effective handling of traffic; would compel them to route freight over lines of railroad whose method of handling traffic is unsatisfactory—who do not promptly return cars and settle accounts; and they point out that as, by section 20 of the existing act, the initial carrier is made liable for any loss, damage, or injury to property caused by it or by any connecting carrier over whose line the property may pass, it would be unfair to compel the initial carrier to direct the shipment over the line of another with whose practices and method of handling business it is dissatisfied and yet for whose action it would be pecuniarily liable. The proposed act endeavors to meet both of these suggestions by giving to the shipper the right to select between any two or more established through routes—a concession which it is believed wil be of great value to the shippers, and yet not unduly burdensome to the carriers.

ANNUAL REPORTS.

Section 11 of the proposed act amends section 20 of the interstate-commerce act so as to empower the commission to require annual reports from the carriers to be made for the period of twelve months, ending either on June 30 in each year, as under the present law, or on December 31 in each year, if the commission shall so require. This provision was inserted at the suggestion of the commission.

PURCHASE OF COMPETING LINES.

For the purpose of "maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines, and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatsoever," it is proposed, by section 12 of the bill to prohibit railroad corporations, being common carriers subject to the interstate-commerce act, from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any interest in the capital stock and from purchasing or leasing the railroad of any railroad corporation owning or operating a line of railroad which is directly and substantially competitive with that of such common carrier respecting the business to which the commerce act applies. Inasmuch as a large number of railroad corporations have heretofore acquired, under sanction of law, stock in other railroad companies, or are operating leased lines which have become integral parts of their systems, it is provided that nothing in section 12 shall operate to prevent a corporation which owns not less than one-half of the entire outstanding stock of another railroad corporation from acquiring the remainder; nor to prevent any corporation operating, under lease made for not less than twenty years, a railroad of any other corporation, from renewing such lease or acquiring the reversion, either directly or through the purchase of stock. Where a company has already acquired one-half of the stock of another, its control is practically as complete as if it had a clear majority, and to prohibit its acquisition of the remainder would operate to deprive the minority stockholders of the best market for their holdings.

On the other hand, where a company is operating as lessee under a long-term lease the railroad of another company, and has incorporated it into its system, the power to acquire the ownership of the demised property is in the public interest, as it unites responsibility with control. It is, however, expressly stipulated in the bill that it shall not affect the rights or liabilities of any party to any pending suit or action, nor authorize nor validate the acquisition by one railroad corporation of any interest in the stock or the purchase or lease of any other railroad, in violation of the Sherman antitrust act. It is further provided that any attempted acquisition, contrary to the provisions of this section, may be enjoined at the suit of the United States by any court of competent jurisdiction; but that any railroad corporation subject to the act may apply to the court of commerce for an adjudication as to the legality of any proposed purchase of stock or interest in a railroad subject to the act; and the court of commerce is given jurisdiction to hear and determine such application on notice to the United States, with power to permanently enjoin any such transaction found to be in violation of the act, the judgment to operate as an estoppel upon the parties.

Some criticism of this section has been made upon the ground that it did not prohibit the acquisition by means of a holding corporation of stocks of competing lines of railway. The provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in the case of Northern Securities Company v. United States (193 U. S., 1), so completely cover that ground that your committee deemed it unnecessary to attempt a repetition of those prohibitions in this act, and for the same reason it was not deemed expedient to attempt to deal with the question of combinations of express companies or telegraph and telephone companies, because, where such combinations constitute a restraint of trade, the Sherman Act affords ample authority to reach and prevent them. Much complaint has arisen because of the uncertainty of the application of the Sherman law to agreements which might in some respects affect competition and therefore be deemed to be in restraint of interstate trade and commerce. Your committee deems it to be reasonable to provide a means of ascertaining by judicial investigation and determination whether or not a bona fide contract proposed to be entered into respecting the acquisition of stock or property of railroads is in violation of the prohibitions of the Sherman Act before large investments of capital are made in reliance upon a seeming, although possibly wholly illusory, legality. If these contracts are submitted to rigorous judicial investigation before the money of stockholders is expended in reliance upon them, many purchases and combinations which violate the terms of the act will be prevented and much loss of capital averted. It is also of obvious advantage to the Government to have such investigation conducted before the contract becomes effective and when the burden is on the carrier to prove that it does not violate the law, rather than after it has gone into effect and the burden is on those who attack it. It has been objected by some that this is a novel form of legal proceeding, but in the opinion of the committee, although novel, it is founded upon sound principles and will tend to a certainty in the administration of the law which is now impossible to realize.

PROVISIONS AFFECTING ISSUE OF STOCKS AND BONDS.

Sections 13 and 14 of the proposed act embody provisions for such national restriction and supervision as, it is hoped, will prevent in the future the overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate carriers.

Much discussion has been had over the relation of stock and bond issues to the federal control over interstate commerce.

That corporations are persons within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment and therefore, under the fifth and fourteenth amendments, may not be deprived of their property without due process of law, nor denied the equal protection of the law, is settled. That fixing rates or charges by railroad companies for the transportation of passengers and property which deprive the companies of the power to charge reasonable rates for the use of their property, such deprivation taking place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, is in effect taking property without due process of law; and in so far as they are thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the companies are deprived of the equal protection of the laws, is also well settled. (See Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466, 523, and cases cited.)

In judicial investigations into the reasonableness of orders fixing rates, or otherwise regulating the practices of carriers, for the purpose of determining whether or not the constitutional rights above referred to have been invaded, while the principle established by the Supreme Court is, as was said in Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466, 546), "that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public."

Nevertheless, in that case, as in others, the court declared that in order to ascertain such fair value "the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stocks * * * are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case."

In the application of these rules every such inquiry involves a consideration of the bonded debt and the outstanding capital stock of the corporation, and elaborate inquiry as to the actual investment represented by such issues.

The effect, therefore, of establishing a method of ascertaining that stock and bonds as issued are founded upon legitimate investments of capital, which shall be the basis of the reasonable return guaranteed as a maximum by the Constitution, would seem clear and to fully warrant the enactment proposed by section 12.

Moreover, the National Government has a direct and legitimate interest in the financial ability of every carrier to perform the duties imposed upon it by acts of Congress in furnishing proper equipment and appliances to carry on interstate commerce in a safe, expeditious, and efficient manner, and to this end to prevent it from impairing such ability by assuming unwarranted financial burdens by the improvident issue and sale of securities without adequate consideration.

In framing legislation for the purpose of carrying out this principle, a superficial consideration of the subject would lead to the simple declaration that capital stock issued by corporations subject to the act should be paid for at par in cash or in property at its fair value, but this would give rise at once to an inquiry whether or not stock of the corporation of a different class would be property within the meaning of such prohibition. Many railroad corporations have already outstanding preferred stock of one or more classes, and it often becomes advantageous to the stockholders, as well as to the companies, that such preferred stock should be exchanged for common stock, and the discrimination between the classes of stocks thus eliminated. So, in many instances, when a company is in good credit it is greatly to its advantage, as well as to the advantage of the public, that it should issue its capital stock for the purpose of retiring its bonded or other fixed indebtedness, thus relieving it of the burden of fixed charges which must be met out of its revenues; and, in a very large number of instances, notes, bonds, or other obligations of railroad companies have been issued under authority of law which, by their terms, entitle the holders, under certain conditions, to convert them into stock of the issuing corporation. Where such obligations have passed into general circulation and must be met by the issuing companies at their face value, it would impair the obligation of such contracts to enact legislation in effect prohibiting the companies from carrying out their contracts. In many instances it has been found by experience that companies can secure a much better purchase price for their obligations if they make them convertible into stock than without that feature; and if the issue of the bonds be carefully guarded so that it be for value and at the fair market or selling price, there is no sound reason why such conditions should be prohibited.

Your committee has not attempted to legislate with respect to the application of the proceeds of bonds issued by railroad companies, as that subject is regulated by the laws of the States under which the companies are incorporated, and the only federal purpose involved is to see that stock is issued at its face value and that bonds are issued for their actual market or selling value. This being achieved, the States by which the various companies are incorporated may be safely left to prescribe the purposes for which such proceeds may be applied. The contention by some that the legislation should be so framed as to prevent a holding corporation from issuing stock and bonds ignores the patent fact that Congress can not legislate with respect to any such holding corporation any further than it has done by declaring against combinations in restraint of trade by the antitrust law, thus furnishing through that law a means of preventing the holding company from being used as a means of interfering with interstate commerce. Aside from such application, Congress has no jurisdiction over the amount of stock and bonds that may be issued by a company formed for the purpose or authorized to acquire and hold stock in other corporations.

Section 13 of the proposed act declares that no railroad corporation subject to the interstate commerce act shall hereafter issue for any purpose connected with or relating to any part of its business governed by such act, any stock, except upon the payment of the par value thereof; or any bond (except notes maturing not more than two years from the date they are issued) without payment of not less than the par value thereof; or if sold at less than par, then at not less than its reasonable market or selling value, to be ascertained by the commission; and that no property or other thing than money shall be taken in payment to the corporation for stock or bonds except at its fair value, which shall be ascertained and certified to by the commission.

It is, however, provided that nothing contained in the act shall be construed to prevent such carrier from issuing its bonds or other obligations to refund those now issued and outstanding to an amount requisite to take up or refund the same; or from issuing its capital stock at par in payment or exchange for bonds or other indebtedness now outstanding, or hereafter issued, in conformity with the requirements of this new act. But for such a provision as this a carrier would be deprived of a very necessary means of meeting its present outstanding indebtedness.

The bill also recognizes that railroad companies must have the right to issue short-term notes without previous authorization from the commission, in order to meet business exigencies arising from time to time, but to prevent such exception being made a means of evading the general provisions of the act restricting the issue of stock and bonds except on proper and ascertained consideration, the bill provides that no stock or bond shall be issued for the purpose of taking up such short-term notes in an amount greater than will suffice to yield a sum equal to the amount of money actually received for the notes, or, if sold for less than par, to yield a sum equal to par, or, if the Interstate Commerce Commission shall find that the notes were not issued in good faith for their reasonable market or selling value, then a sum equal to the amount of notes which the commission shall find would have availed to procure for the corporation had they been sold at their reasonable market value a sum equal to the consideration actually received for the notes by the corporation. Section 13 further provides against the issue of capital stock of one class convertible into that of another class, except share for share. With that limitation, no public purpose is invaded by the issue of one share of stock for a share of another class of the same stock.

Section 13 further provides that the act shall not be construed to prohibit the pledge of bonds as security for other notes, bonds, etc., not issued in violation of the act, but in order that this privilege may not be used merely as a means to procure the issue of bonds in violation of the restrictions of the bill, it is further enacted that such notes or bonds shall provide that none of the pledged securities upon nonpayment of the secured notes or bonds shall be sold except after public advertisement; or in case the bonds so secured shall confer upon their holders the right to convert the same into pledged bonds, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have previously ascertained and certified to the reasonable market value of the pledged bonds, and the rate which such value bears to the reasonable market value of the secured notes, bonds, etc., and that such conversion be a rate not greater than in accordance with such ascertainment and certificate.

These provisions are so framed as not to prevent the ordinary means of financing railroad companies, while interposing an effectual protection against the issue of stock or bonds without adequate consideration.

Some objection has been urged to the provisions of section 13 on the ground that to require stock to be issued only at its par value is to prevent its use in the manner in which it must be employed, in order that capital be secured for the construction of railroads in undeveloped portions of the country.

It is no doubt true that the practice of issuing stock as a bonus with bonds was very common in this country at the time when there was the greatest activity in railroad construction throughout the country. It is also true that the practice was contrary to the law of most States, and that it gave rise to great evils which have called for legislative remedy.

While in one case (Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S., 417) the Supreme Court approved of the issue of stock of a going company as a bonus to assist in the sale of its bonds, the laws of the State under which the company was organized not forbidding, yet that decision has never been followed in any subsequent case, and even in that case Mr. Justice Brown, writing the opinion of the court, said:

"The stock of a corporation is supposed to stand in the place of actual property of substantial value, and as being a convenient method of representing the interest of each stockholder in such property, and to the extent to which it fails to represent such value it is either a deception and a fraud upon the public or an evidence that the original value of the corporate property has become depreciated."

Further provisions are contained in the proposed act to prevent it from operating as an impairment of any contract with respect to the issue of pledge or stock or bonds heretofore executed and in force.

While it may be objected that the provisions of this act do not go far enough in regulating the capitalization of railroad corporations, no candid critic can fail to admit that they constitute a long step in the direction of establishing such national legislation and supervision as will prevent the future overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate carriers, and that they go as far as prudent legislation should go in entering upon this new field of national restraint upon the issue of stock and bonds by interstate carriers.

REORGANIZATION AND MERGER.

By section 14 of the bill provision is made for the granting by the commission to a committee on reorganization of any company or companies subject to the act, of any certificate necessary with respect to the proposed issue of stock or bonds, and that the act shall not operate to prevent the issue pursuant to any such plan of reorganization of stock to an amount in the aggregate not exceeding the par value of the stocks of the corporation proposed to be reorganized; nor the issue by such new corporation of bonds, etc., to an aggregate amount not exceeding the amount of new money paid to the new corporation under the plan of reorganization and of existing bonds of other obligations or debts, provided the aggregate amount of interest charges of the bonds or obligations to be issued by the new corporation, or to which its property is to be subject, shall not exceed the aggregate amount of the interest charges to which its property was subject before the reorganization, plus interest upon bonds issued for new money.

In the case of a consolidation or merger of corporations, it is provided that the act shall not be deemed to prohibit the issue of stocks to an amount not exceeding the aggregate par amount of the stocks of the corporations consolidated or merged, nor of bonds to an amount not exceeding the aggregate amount of the existing bonds, provided the interest payable on the same shall not exceed the aggregate interest payable on the bonds, etc., of the corporations so consolidated or merged.

It is further provided that nothing in the act contained shall prevent a railroad corporation subject to the act from acquiring the stock and bonds of another noncompeting railroad corporation by the issue of its own stock and bonds, provided the aggregate amount thereof shall not exceed—

1. The fair value of the property of the corporation whose stock and bonds are so acquired, such value to be ascertained by the commission; or

2. The aggregate par value of the stock and bonds so acquired, but without increase in the aggregate interest payable thereon, which fact shall be ascertained by the commission; but it is further provided that nothing in the act contained shall be construed to authorize or validate a consolidation or merger in violation of the Sherman Act or any other act of Congress.

It is believed that these provisions, while preserving the principle of the act to prevent the improvident issue of stock and bonds without adequate consideration, will allow practicable means of reorganizing existing companies on a sound basis.

By section 15 the Interstate Commerce Commission is given jurisdiction to entertain applications for certificates under sections 13 and 14, and the issue of stock or bonds contrary to the provisions of sections 13 or 14 may be enjoined at the suit of the United States or of an officer of the corporation, or the holder of not less than 10 per cent of its stock, and penalties are imposed for violation of the act.

Section 16 provides that nothing in the act shall affect proceedings pending before the commission, and section 17 authorizes necessary inquiries to be prosecuted before a single commissioner, whose decision shall be taken as that of the commission, unless either party shall object, in which case the matter is to be submitted to the full commission.

Respectfully submitted.

[Senate Report No. 355, part 2, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY (TO ACCOMPANY S. 6737).

I.

The members of the committee whose names are hereto signed do not concur with the majority of the committee in the recommendation that Senate bill 6737 pass without amendment. They beg to recommend the passage of the bill with certain amendments, which are either submitted herewith or herein mentioned. They are of the opinion that the bill as reported by the committee, while it has some excellent provisions, is as a whole not an advance in the regulation of interstate commerce, but a long step backward; and the effect of the bill, if it becomes a law, will be not to further restrain the power of common carriers, but to seriously impair the efficiency of existing statutes. It furnishes common carriers new weapons, and it weakens rather than strengthens those heretofore given to the people for their defense.

The first six sections of the bill create and equip a court to be known as the United States court of commerce. This court is to be composed of five circuit judges, to sit chiefly in Washington, but with power to sit anywhere. A full corps of officers, such as usually accompany a court, is provided for. Five new circuit judges are to be appointed, and in the first instance these new judges are to constitute the court. After having served for a time, they are to return to the circuits and the commerce court is to be recruited from the ranks of the circuit judges generally. The commerce court is given exclusive original jurisdiction of four classes of cases of which the circuit courts of the United States now exercise jurisdiction. A new jurisdiction is conferred which will be hereafter more specifically noted. Of the four classes of cases the one of importance is the second, which includes "cases brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

As we view the matter, the court and the expenditure it involves are wholly unnecessary. According to the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission there arose between the time the Hepburn Act went into effect in the middle of the year 1906 and the close of the year 1909, a period of three and one-half years, 26 cases, of which the court of commerce would have had jurisdiction had it been in existence during that time; that is to say, less than eight cases per year. It seems to us indefensible to put upon the taxpayers the burden of maintaining such a court under such circumstances. The view we have taken is, we think, emphasized when it is remembered that the jurisdiction of the courts over the orders of the commission, as interpreted by the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central Railroad, so narrows the power of the courts that in the future it may be safely asserted that there will be fewer attacks upon these orders than there have been in the past. The suggestion that the institution of the court of commerce will bring uniformity into the decisions and that it will speed the disposition of cases that may arise is without merit, inasmuch as the Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the law, and there is no substantial similarity in the facts which the cases develop, nor in the past has there been undue delay in the trial of such cases.

An inspection of the record will show that the time has been consumed in the preparation of the testimony, and not in reaching a conclusion after the submission to the courts. Further, it seems to us fundamentally wrong to create a court whose sole work will be the trial of railway cases. Without enlarging upon the subject, we merely remind the Senate of the tremendous influences that will inevitably surround the selection of such a tribunal. It is far better for the country that all such controversies shall be disposed of by the regularly constituted judicial tribunals, proceeding in the orderly established way. We therefore recommend the adoption of an amendment as follows:

Strike from the title of the bill, in the first line thereof, the following words: "create a court of commerce;" and also strike out, beginning with the word "that," in line 3, page 1, down to and including the word "transfer," in line 5, page 13.

If the foregoing amendments are not adopted, we recommend that the proposed new court be reduced to three members. If we are to have an additional tribunal, three judges will be able to do all the work that will come before them and still have much leisure time. There is no necessity for a large court in order to guard against possible error, for every judgment of the court of commerce is reviewable by the Supreme Court. To that end, we submit the following amendments:

Strike out of line 24, page 2, the word "five" and insert "three."

Strike out of line 2, page 3, the word "five" and insert "three."

Strike out of line 4, page 3, the word "five" and insert "three."

Strike out of line 6, page 3, the comma after the word "three;" also strike out the word "four" with the comma after the same and the words "and five," and insert the word "and" after the word "two."

Strike out of line 17, page 3, the word "five" and insert "three."

In line 1, page 4, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "three."

Strike out of line 13, page 4, the word "four" and insert the word "two."

If, however, the Senate shall be of the opinion that we ought to add a new court of five judges to our judicial system, it then becomes of the first importance to prescribe with accuracy the jurisdiction which the new court is to exercise. It will be remembered that in the notable debate of 1906, arising upon a proposal to amend the interstate-commerce law, the jurisdiction which the court should be permitted to hold over the acts of the commission was regarded by everybody as of the highest concern. After much discussion and great deliberation the provisions which are now found in section 15 of the act of 1887 as amended were agreed upon. We shall not attempt to state the jurisdiction so conferred, for it has finally received a definition in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. The Illinois Central Railroad, decided at the present term of the Supreme Court of the United States. It may, however, be noted in passing that in section 15, as so amended in 1906, it was provided—

"That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted, except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the commission. An appeal may be taken from the interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit, but shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States."

In the bill under consideration all that part of section 15 which relates to suits brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the commission is repealed, and the whole subject is disposed of in those sections of the present bill which create the United States court of commerce and set forth its jurisdiction and procedure. For the moment our observations are confined to the jurisdiction and power of the new court in suits brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend, in whole or in part, an order of the commission. It is hardly necessary to remark that hereupon there arises the ancient controversy with respect to the extent to which such orders shall be reviewable by the courts. The common carriers have always contended for a broad review, approaching as nearly as possible a retrial, upon its merits, of the case decided by the commission. On the other hand, the advocates of effective regulation have always contended that the review should be brought down and narrowed to the constitutional point—that is to say, should be limited to the inquiry as to whether the constitutional rights of the carrier were invaded.

The moment the bill we are now considering was made public, the fear was expressed in many quarters that the provisions of the first six paragraphs of section 1, coupled with the last paragraph but one of the same section, and section 3 would enlarge the jurisdiction and power of the court of commerce over such orders of the commission as compared with the jurisdiction and power of the circuit courts under the existing law, so that the court of commerce in the trial of any such case would not be limited to the inquiries, first, did the commission obtain jurisdiction by proper procedure, and, second, did it so abuse its discretion as to infringe upon a constitutional right, and (possibly) third, was its order within the power granted by the law; but would be extended to a practical retrial upon the merits of the order.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its appearance before the committee, submitted a statement upon the subject which we quote:

"Assuming, as we do, that it is so intended, and to remove any doubt that may hereafter arise, we strongly recommend that the bill be so amended as to contain the explicit statement that the commerce court shall have no jurisdiction or power over orders of the commission not now possessed by circuit courts of the United States as defined and limited by the Supreme Court in the 'car distribution' cases, so-called, which were recently decided. Therefore we desire to have the language of the bill expressly limit the jurisdiction of the court of commerce as the Supreme Court has in effect limited the jurisdiction of circuit courts under the present law by holding, in substance, that orders of the commission involving the exercise of judgment and discretion are not open to review by the courts unless (a) the commission has acted without jurisdiction or (b) made an order which operates to deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law.

"To this end we propose the following amendment: After the word 'exclusive,' in line 12, page 2, insert 'but nothing in this act contained shall be construed to give the court of commerce in such cases any jurisdiction or authority not now possessed by circuit courts of the United States or the judges thereof.' Strike out the words 'but this act,' in said line 12, and insert 'this act, however.'"

The Attorney-General, who drafted the bill, was evidently impressed with the suggestion, and in the next succeeding revise of his draft adopted the idea, but, preferring his own method of correction, inserted an amendment immediately following line 16 of page 2 of the bill now before the Senate, as follows:

"But nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed as enlarging the jurisdiction now possessed by the circuit courts of the United States or the judges thereof, which is hereby transferred to and vested in the court of commerce."

It is fair to say that the Attorney-General expressed the opinion that the bill, as he had originally drawn it, did not confer any jurisdiction upon the court of commerce, so far as these cases are concerned, that is not now possessed by the circuit courts; but to remove any doubt, he inserted the amendment just quoted. The advocates of a broad review were not content with this plain statement, because, as is evident, they hoped that the bill as originally drafted would be interpreted to give the court of commerce greater jurisdiction over such orders than the circuit courts now have. After some discussion upon the point the Attorney-General withdrew the amendment, and it does not appear in the bill reported by the committee and now before the Senate. If, therefore, the bill passes as it has been reported, it will be with the understanding that the carriers, and those who have always insisted upon a broad review, will contend that the law has been changed, and that the court of commerce will be invested with the jurisdiction to practically retry, upon the merits, cases that have been decided by the commission.

It would unduly lengthen this report to enter upon an argument respecting the proper interpretation of the bill as it is reported. This will be done in the debate before the Senate. It must be clear, however, that there can be no possible reason for leaving any doubt whatsoever upon the subject, or any opportunity for contention. We insist that either the amendment proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the amendment proposed by the Attorney-General, which he afterwards withdrew, or better still the one we now propose, be made a part of the bill. We believe that the doubt will be removed in the fewest possible words by striking out line 6, page 1, and substituting the following:

"have exclusive original jurisdiction over all cases of the following kinds, but no other, different, or greater jurisdiction with respect thereto than is now possessed and exercised under existing law by the circuit courts of the United States."

Recalling attention to the quotation heretofore made from section 15 of the act to which the present bill is an amendment, it will be observed that no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining an order of the commission can be issued without at least five days' notice. The present bill authorizes such an injunction without any notice whatever. We quote a sentence from section 3:

"No order or injunction so restraining or suspending an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be made by the court of commerce otherwise than upon notice and after hearing, except that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the petitioner said court or a judge thereof may allow a temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part of the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission for not more than sixty days from the date of the order, pending application to the court for its order or injunction."

When it is remembered that it is the general law that no preliminary injunction can be issued without a showing of irreparable injury, it is manifest that this section of the bill withdraws the safeguards which a former Congress put around the shippers and remits them to the injustice from which the act of 1906 sought to protect them. To prevent this backward step, we propose the following amendment: Strike from line 16, page 10, all after the word "suit" to and including line 7, page 11, and substitute therefor the following:

"No injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission shall be granted except on hearing after not less than five days' notice, and appeal may be taken from an interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing an injunction in any suit to the Supreme Court of the United States."

II.

The most objectionable and harmful feature of the bill under consideration is found in the departure from the existing method of defending suits brought by common carriers to set aside, annul, enjoin, or suspend the orders and requirements of the commission. As the law now is, all such suits are brought against the Interstate Commerce Commission and are defended by the commission, and the almost universal practice of the commission is to secure the assistance of the attorney who conducted the case before the commission in behalf of the complainant or complainants. In this way the common carrier is met in the courts (1) by the commission having full knowledge of the case and with an interest to defend it; (2) by attorneys who are as familiar with the facts as are the carriers themselves. The result is a real lawsuit, the commission being moved by the natural desire to maintain its order and the shipper being moved by the determination to secure the redress of a wrong.

The bill reported by the majority of the committee proposes that all suits attacking orders or requirements of the commission shall be brought against the United States, and the commission and all other parties interested in the outcome are by express provision prohibited from taking any part in the proceedings before the court of commerce. The defense is placed wholly in the hands of the Attorney-General and his Assistant Attorneys-General; and it is fair to assume that his discretion to employ counsel will not be often exercised in the employment of attorneys who conducted the proceedings before the commission, although their ability to conduct such cases is evidenced by their success in securing the order sought to be set aside. It is our deliberate judgment that this transfer of responsibility and power will destroy in large measure the efficiency of the interstate commerce law; and we look upon it as the most serious blow that could be dealt to those who must from time to time ask their Government for relief from the injustice inflicted by railway companies and other common carriers.

The cases that are prosecuted before the Interstate Commerce Commission arise out of wrongs put upon the shippers, who are vitally interested in fair transportation charges. Let us see what will happen. These shippers complain to the commission, and with infinite labor and careful investigation upon the part of their attorneys they make their case, and the commission awards them a remedy. The railway company or companies assail the order in the court of commerce. The shippers are just as much concerned in the judgment of the court as they were in the award of the commission; but they are not only deprived of any influence or control of the matter thereafter, but the commission itself is forbidden to take any part in it. The whole subject passes into the hands of the Department of Justice, which, although equipped with excellent lawyers, knows nothing about the case and can have no more than an abstract interest in it.

The Department of Justice makes itself familiar with the work that has been done by the commission as best it can, and then it may either defend or not defend, as it pleases. If it should happen to believe that the commission was wrong in its order, it would of course not defend, but allow final judgment to be entered in favor of the common carrier. Thus the amazing spectacle would be constantly presented of a review of the orders of the commission not by a court, but by the Department of Justice. Not only so, but if it should happen that the peace and quiet of business required at that particular time a conservative administration of the law, we assume that the Department of Justice would feel that it ought to go a little slow, lest a financial or commercial disturbance might ensue. If the particular case should be fortunate enough to successfully run the gantlet of these considerations, it would then be in the hands of a lawyer who knew nothing about it, although it had already been once tried. He would be necessarily ignorant of the vast details of evidence, with the complications and intricacies of rates and transportation conditions, and no matter how good a lawyer he might be, and we assume that none but competent lawyers would be in the Department of Justice, nevertheless he would prepare the testimony and try the case under the most disadvantageous circumstances that can be conceived.

We reiterate our conclusion that to pass over in this manner the defense of cases brought to set aside or enjoin the orders of the commission to any department and to exclude the commission and all the parties before the commission from any participation in the case is to deprive the people of the most effective weapon that the present law has put into their hands. We recommend therefore the following amendments in order to keep the defense of such suits where it now is and where it properly belongs:

Strike from line 9, page 8, the words "United States" and insert the words "Interstate Commerce Commission."

Strike from lines 11 and 12, page 8, the words "and in the Department of Justice."

Strike out lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, and the words "United States, and," in line 12, page 11, leaving section 4 to read:

"The United States may intervene in any case or proceeding in the court of commerce whenever, though it has not been made a party, public interests are involved."

Strike out section 5, being from and including line 15, page 11, to and including line 3, page 12.

We believe that the parties in interest before the commission should be granted the absolute right to appear in any suit brought to set aside the order which such parties have procured from the commission, and therefore we recommend an amendment as follows:

Insert at the end of line 8, page 9, the following:

"In any suit brought in said court of commerce to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission any person, copartnership, or corporation which was a party to the proceeding in which the order sought to be enjoined, set aside, annulled, or suspended was made shall have the right to appear in the court of commerce and be made a party thereto, and shall be permitted to introduce evidence and make argument as though an original party to the suit, and upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be heard in like manner as though originally a party to the suit."

III.

Section 7 of the bill repeals the antitrust law with respect to agreements between common carriers specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, charges for transportation of passengers and freight, and expressly legalizes them. The only power reserved to the commission upon the subject is that it may change the rates, fares, charges, or classifications after hearing, exactly as it may change any rates, fares, charges, or classifications put into effect by individual carriers. It is obvious that this provision will destroy the last vestige of competition between carriers as to rates. It is only necessary to observe all the railways of the country in a single meeting consulting about rates and with the power to agree upon them to understand that this amendment to the law would result in the surrender of all independence on the part of the railwnys which can afford to put in low rates. The inevitable consequence must be an increase in rates.

It has long been recognized that stability in the business of transportation requires some cooperation among the carriers, but until this bill was introduced it had never been proposed by any friend of regulation that the unlimited and unqualified power conferred by this section would be of advantage to the people. The only defense for this section that has been suggested is that the Republican party declared for it in its platform of 1908, and that therefore it is the duty of the members of that party to carry the announcement of the platform into effect. The members of the committee who sign this report are Republicans; but they deny that this section is an effort to put the platform of their party into law; on the contrary, they insist that the proposed amendment is in direct violation of the platform. They take the liberty of quoting that part of the Republican announcement. It is as follows:

"We believe, however, that the interstate-commerce law should be further amended so as to give railroads the right to make and publish traffic agreements subject to the approval of the commission, but maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatsoever."

If language means anything, the above quotation means that such agreements made by the carriers shall be approved by the commission before they become effective, and yet the amendment we are considering specifically allows the agreements to go into force without the approval of the commission. In order, therefore, to prevent the complete abandonment of a cherished principle heretofore held inviolable, as well as to bring the proposed law into harmony with the platform of the party now in power, the minority signing this report recommends the following amendment:

Insert, after the word "if," in line 17, page 13, the following:

"made in terms subject to the approval of the commission, and if also any such agreement, together with all the rates, fares, charges, or classifications therein prescribed or therein referred to, shall be approved by the commission before any such agreement, rates, fares, charges, or classifications go into effect."

Strike out the word "a," in line 17, page 13, and insert the words "and a."

Strike out the word "is," in line 18, page 13, and insert the words "shall be."

IV.

Section 8 of the bill is an attempt to make carriers more careful in quoting rates to proposed shippers. There have been many instances in which serious loss has been sustained by reason of the inaccuracy of the statements of agents in giving information with regard to rates. It is impossible to award damages to the shipper for such misstatements, because it would be easy under such practice, by collusion between the carrier and the shipper, to give rebates and make discriminations. Therefore the remedy must be confined to a penalty imposed upon the carrier.

There are two respects, however, in which the section as reported by the majority is defective; first, it is confined to railroad corporations, whereas it ought to embrace all common carriers subject to the act. We therefore recommend that the words "railroad corporation, being a" be stricken out of line 24, page 14. It is unjust, also, to confine the imposition of the penalty to the cases specifically mentioned in the section. It ought to be imposed whenever the rate is misstated or there is a refusal to state a rate and the shipper suffers legal damage from the misstatement or the refusal to give the rate, as the case may be. We therefore recommend that there be stricken out of line 10 all after the word "rate," and lines 11, 12, 13, 14, and the words

"his or its cost," in line 15; all on page 15. We further recommend, in order to carry out fully the purpose of the first amendment, that the words "railroad corporation," in line 19, page 15, be stricken out and that there be inserted the words "common carrier."

V.

Section 9 of the bill rewrites section 15 of the present interstate-commerce law. The first paragraph of the section provides the authority of the commission in prescribing rates, charges, regulations, and practices for the future, and it enlarges the authority of the commission in two respects—first, to proceed to an investigation and hearing upon its own initiative, and, second, to deal with classifications affecting rates. We thoroughly approve this enlargement, and have only to suggest that if the real controversies which are now before the commission, and which will constantly come before the commission, are to be settled effectually, the commission must at least have the additional power to prescribe a relation between rates. Without this power the contest between the various communities of the country, and especially the western country, for commercial advantage will never be satisfactorily adjusted. We therefore recommend the following amendment:

Insert after the word "charged," in line 5, page 17, the words "or to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable relation between such rates or charges to be thereafter observed;" also insert after the word "prescribed," in line 14, page 17, the words "and preserve the relation so fixed."

The second paragraph of the section is entirely new to the law. It confers upon the commission the power to suspend changes in rates, pending a hearing upon the propriety of the change, for not to exceed sixty days beyond the time when the proposed changes would otherwise go into effect. We fear that the limitation will nullify the object sought to be accomplished, because it is admitted that it would be impossible for the commission to make the proper investigation of the larger number of the changes that will be made within the time so fixed. It is so vital to the business of the country that there shall be a reasonable supervision exercised by the commission before changes in rates shall go into effect that we earnestly recommend an amendment which will permit the suspension to continue until the hearing is concluded. Therefore we suggest the following:

Strike out from and after the word "practice," in line 22, page 18, to and including the word "effect," in line 25, page 18.

VI.

Section 12 of the bill, as reported by the committee, begins with the laudable attempt to prevent the consolidation or combination of railway lines which "directly and substantially" compete with each other; but before it reaches its end, it not only nullifies the prohibition with which it started out, but actually takes the back track, and if it were to become a part of the law, it is our opinion that consolidations and combinations could be lawfully effected that are now forbidden. Our first objection to the section is that it is confined to railroad corporations. It does not pretend even to control those instances, of which we have seen many in the past and of which we will see more in the future, that present a consolidation or combination between water routes and rail routes. It does not include express companies or telegraph and telephone companies, and by its express terms suburban or interurban electric passenger railway corporations are declared not to be railroad corporations within the meaning of the section.

In so far as this bill is concerned, a railroad corporation could buy all the competitive steamship or steamboat lines, or any interest in them, or could consolidate water and land transportation in any way that the existing statutes will permit, and on the other hand the same freedom is preserved to the water lines in dealing with the land lines. Any railway company operated by electric power and carrying passengers could purchase, so far as this bill would affect the transaction, all the railways in the United States and combine them into a single corporation; and likewise any railroad company operated by steam could extinguish all the competition of electric railways by purchase, lease, or combination. Moreover, the holding corporation is in nowise restricted by the bill from acquiring any ownership or control of competing lines of transportation that would not fall under the condemnation of the antitrust law. The section not only permits a railroad company that has acquired, before the act goes into effect, 50 per cent of the capital stock of a competing line, to purchase and hold the remainder, but it expressly authorizes the renewal of any lease which runs for more than twenty years, or the purchase of the reversionary interest of the lessee by the lessor.

The defects in the section just recited are bad enough, when it is remembered that the purpose of any new legislation upon the subject is to strengthen the law rather than to leave it as it is; but these defects seem to lose their importance when compared with the striking characteristic of the section. It is proposed in the latter part of the section to create a novel kind of lawsuits, and to confer upon the court of commerce the jurisdiction to hear and decide cases before the transactions out of which they arise take place. It is provided that when any individuals or corporations are about to effect a purchase or consolidation which may be contrary to the law, they shall state their case to the court of commerce; that thereupon the Department of Justice shall appear and defend for the United States; that if, upon the hearing, the court finds that the case, as stated, would be lawful if carried into an actual transaction, then the court shall issue a certificate of innocence which will create an estoppel as between the transaction and the United States. We look upon such a procedure as indefensible, even if it were limited to the jurisdiction already described.

We know of no good reason why a court should attempt to declare in advance the legality of a proposed railway merger, any more than it should attempt to determine for an individual what he may lawfully do in his business. The proposition, however, would not be so startling if the court, in deciding such a case, were limited to the ascertainment of the legality of the contemplated merger, tested by the provisions of the law, as laid down either in this bill or by the provisions in the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, commonly known as the "antitrust law." The most extraordinary feature of the section will be found in its closing sentence, which we quote:

"In making the determination herein provided for the court shall take into consideration the effect of such proposed acquisition upon the due observance and effective enforcement of all the laws of the United States, and the relative importance of any benefit to the public interest and of any effect upon competition resulting from such acquisition."

If these be not mere idle words, they confer upon the judicial branch of the Government a power which Congress can not constitutionally grant, and which, if it could be granted, would destroy the fundamental principles of civilized and organized society. In effect this sentence says to the court of commerce: If you find the proposed merger, purchase, or consolidation to be contrary to all the acts of Congress upon the subject, and especially the antitrust act, and contrary to the provisions of this particular bill, nevertheless you may enter a judgment of legality that will forever bind the United States and forever protect the proponents of the merger, purchase, or consolidation, if you believe that upon the whole the contemplated transaction will be of benefit to the public interest, and all this notwithstanding the well-settled policy of the people and every legislative body which forbids the merger or consolidation in any form of competing lines of transportation.

To merely state such a doctrine is to pronounce its severest condemnation. It is manifest that the attempt to bestown such jurisdiction upon a court is an attempt to grant to the court legislative power; and if it could be done, it would violate the most cherished and the most sacred principles of representative government. We shall, during the course of the consideration of the bill by the Senate, present a substitute for the section, the purpose and effect of which will be to effectually prevent the further consolidation, through stock interest, lease, or purchase, of competitive lines of transportation. We had hoped to be able to present it to the committee, but the precipitate action of the committee in reporting the bill immediately after the hearings upon it had closed has made it impossible to incorporate the amendment in our report.

VII.

Sections 13, 14, and 15 of the bill add to the existing law a plan for the regulation of the capitalization of railroad corporations. It is so intricate and complicated that an effort on our part to state just what is accomplished would make our report unreasonably long. We content ourselves, therefore, with an expression of our conclusions. We have reached them after the most careful study of these sections, and being in full sympathy with the universal demand that all the power that Congress has should be exerted to prevent the overcapitalization not only of the railroad corporations, but of all common-carrier corporations.

1. We believe that, however commendable the motive which inspired the writer of these sections, the abuse of overcapitalization can be continued under them without legal abatement.

2. We believe that a plain, straightforward declaration that capital stock issued by corporations which Congress has the power to regulate shall be paid for at par, and that if paid for in property or services the reasonable value of the property and services shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is all that is required; and that the infinite variety of qualifications and exceptions found in these sections should be eliminated.

3. We believe that capitalization of common carriers represented by bonds will be sufficiently guarded if the purposes for which the proceeds of the bonds can be used are carefully prescribed and the proper penalties for misuse of the proceeds are imposed.

4. We believe that it would be prudent to so separate the legislation upon this subject as not to imperil the regulations enacted under an unquestioned legislative power by their association with the exercise of a legislative power which, although we believe it exists, has not yet been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Of these sections, as of section 12, we say that the unexpected action of the committee in reporting the bill as soon as the hearings had finished, prevented us from maturing the substitute which will be offered for the proposed legislation respecting capitalization; but it will be presented to the Senate in the early consideration of the bill.

In order that it may be known that our objections to these sections are not conjectural, we beg to point out some of the provisions which we think render the whole plan ineffective:

1. It is confined to railroad corporations, whereas it ought to include all corporation common carriers subject to the act.

2. The inhibition as to the issuance of both stock and bonds is limited in lines 8, 9, and 10, page 30, as follows: "Shall hereafter issue for any purpose connected with or relating to any part of its business governed by said act to regulate commerce," etc. A moment's thought will convince anyone that these words destroy the force of the whole plan, and if it is necessary to use them in order to make the plan constitutional, then it might as well be abandoned, for it would lead the people into the belief that we are doing something, when in fact we are not.

3. There is nothing to prevent a holding corporation from issuing all the stock and bonds that it pleases to issue.

4. The privileges extended in reorganizations and consolidations have practically no limit.

5. There is no regulation concerning the capitalization of the increasing values of existing property or of earnings that have been expended in extending or improving property.

6. It is expressly provided that, although every provision of the law be violated in the issuance of stocks and bonds, they shall nevertheless be valid in the hands of innocent purchasers. This in itself makes the proposed amendment substantially valueless. If this is to be the policy as to future issues, we might as well forego the attempt to limit capitalization.

VIII.

Although not within the scope of the amendments to the existing law proposed in the bill reported by the committee, the minority signing this report recommends that section 1 of the act of 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding thereto the following:

"The term 'common carrier' shall include all corporations which hold such an interest, direct or indirect, in the stock, bonds, or property of a common carrier as gives control or management over such common carrier or its affairs."

We respectfully submit that if the bill reported by the committee, or anything like it, is to become a law, the holding corporations should be brought within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and within the provisions of the laws regulating common carriers.

Respectfully submitted.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

[Senate Report No. 355, part 3, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

VIEWS OF MR. NEWLANDS, OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE (TO ACCOMPANY S. 6737).

This bill, creating an interstate commerce court and to amend the interstate commerce act, was prepared by the Attorney-General under the instructions of the President, and has been submitted by the President to Congress under that clause of the Constitution which gives the President the power to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he may deem necessary and expedient. It has many admirable features and is in some respects a step far in advance of past legislation upon the subject; but, as its full consideration in the Committee on Interstate Commerce was interrupted by a premature motion to report it to the Senate, I have not yet come to a conclusion regarding all of its provisions, and shall therefore refrain from comment or criticism regarding them until the debate in the Senate.

I avail myself, however, of the opportunity of a minority report to emphasize the views expressed by me in the report of the so-called "Hepburn bill" four years ago that the legislation regarding interstate commerce in which Congress has thus far indulged has been incomplete and fragmentary. The pending bill, whilst more comprehensive than previous legislation, lacks completeness in that it fails to provide for the valuations of railways and for the creation of national corporate agencies for the conduct of interstate transportation.

The Constitution has vested in Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign countries. Interstate transportation has grown so prodigiously that, according to the opinion of experts, it now constitutes three-fourths of the traffic of the country. The States having divested themselves of the power to regulate interstate commerce and having vested it in the Nation, have a right to demand that the Nation should exercise this power in the fullest and most comprehensive way for the general welfare. Thus far the Nation has exercised its power in a lame and halting fashion, and so abuses have sprung up which the States are powerless to control and which the Nation, whose jurisdiction is as broad as interstate commerce itself, can alone correct.

THE EVOLUTION OF RAILROADS.

Originally railroads were organized, constructed, and operated entirely within the boundaries of the respective States. Interstate connection was later made at state boundaries, but each line was operated separately. Then came through service of cars and trains by traffic arrangement. Then came consolidation of control through leases or sale with the legislative sanction of the States affected, the purchasing or leasing road being incorporated under the laws of one State and its acquisitions in other States being accomplished with the consent of their legislatures. Then came the great holding company, generally organized in the State most lax in corporate control, securing control of railroads in many States by acquiring the majority of their stock, such transaction being accomplished by exchanging the exaggerated issues of stocks and bonds of the holding company for shares of the constituent companies.

In this way hundreds of railroad companies organized and operating under the laws of different States would be brought under the control of a foreign corporation organized under the laws of a State in which not a mile of the railroad operated existed. Some States derive large revenues from granting roving charters of this nature. In most cases the consolidation of the roads save where it involved competing lines, resulted favorably to the public through the perfection of administration and service; but it also resulted in large overcapitalization and in a complexity of financing, puzzling both to the investor and to the regulating tribunals. Had Congress anticipated this consolidation by providing the machinery for it through a national incorporation act, consolidation would have been accomplished without these attendant evils.

NATIONAL INCORPORATION.

It is my purpose to offer as an amendment to the bill under consideration an additional section, which is appended (Appendix A). This amendment is similar in terms, though somewhat altered in details, to a bill which I have offered at every session for the past five years. It provides for the formation of national corporations for railroad and navigation lines engaged in interstate and foreign commerce; for the acquisition of state railroads by such corporations by purchase, consolidation, or merger, with the consent of the States affected, and for the control of their stock and bond issues. It subjects the physical property and equipment of such corporations to the taxation of the States, but protects them, as national instrumentalities, against the taxation of their franchises, stocks, and bonds. It provides for the exercise of the power of eminent domain under the judicial procedure of the States. It disclaims interference with the police laws of the States, and, by declaring that any corporation organized under the act shall be deemed a citizen of every State in which its lines are located, preserves the jurisdiction of the state courts, except where a federal question is involved. It provides for an accident and insurance fund for the relief of employees disqualified by injury or age. It authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to act as a board of conciliation in all disputes between corporations and their employees. It limits dividends to 7 per cent, but provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission may direct the application of surplus profits, in whole or in part, to betterment of the roads or of equipment or to extra dividends, or to a guaranty fund against future inadequacy of earnings.

The argument in behalf of national incorporation of transportation companies was presented by me in a report upon the so-called "Hepburn bill," filed March 15, 1906, and is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1242, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

VIEWS OF MR. NEWLANDS.

While I have joined in the report on House bill No. 12987 (Hepburn bill), amendatory of the interstate-commerce act, and am in sympathy with its general purposes, and believe that it is well framed to cover its main purpose as to the regulation of rates, I think it should be classed with the incomplete and fragmentary legislation regarding interstate commerce in which Congress has thus far indulged.

I believe that this is the time for full and comprehensive legislation. I do not believe that our legislation will be as effective as it should be unless it adds to the pending measure provisions for the national incorporation of railways engaged in interstate commerce, guarding against overcapitalization, fixing with certainty the rule for the taxation of such railway property by the States, and prescribing a fixed limit for dividends.

Such legislation should not simply cover the interests of the shippers and the common carriers; it should embrace the interests of labor by providing for an insurance fund against accidents and old age and for conciliation of disputes between carriers and their employees. Such legislation should be simple, definite, certain, should cover every question relating to the regulation of interstate commerce, including the creation of the artificial beings called corporations that are to conduct it. It should frankly recognize the economic necessity of consolidation and combination and the essentially monopoly character of the business, and regulate consolidation, combination, and monopoly with a proper regard for the interests of the public served by it, the property rights of the capital employed in it, and the human rights of the labor employed by it.

RAILROAD GROWTH AND CONSOLIDATION.

The railroad mileage has increased from 23 miles in 1830 to 213,000 miles in 1905. This mileage is owned by over 2,000 railroad corporations created by state laws. As the result of consolidation, combination, and recombination, the operation of these 2,000 railroads has been mainly unified under the control of less than ten systems, each organized under the laws of a single State, generally bearing the name of a single man, who is regarded as the dominant factor in its control.

The controllers of these systems resort for the machinery of combination to the States whose laws are most lax in proper restrictions regarding combination and overcapitalization.

CONTROL OF PRODUCTION.

In many cases the controlling corporation of a system, in addition to securing the control of a vast mileage through purchase or lease, also buys the stock of troublesome rivals, and thus gradually brings about a community of interests which results in the suppression of competition and the stability of rates. It also in some cases purchases the control of producing companies in coal and iron, and thus, in connection with other corporations bound to it by a community of interest, controls the production of coal and iron in such States as Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

In addition to this, the men who control the great industrial combinations have become the controlling spirits of the great railroad combinations, and thus monopoly in transportation and monopoly in production have become united in the realization of profit. The pending bill provides no remedy for this abuse.

CONTROL OF CAPITALIZATION.

As a rule in the formation of these great railroad combinations there is no public supervision or control over the amount of their capitalization, this being left entirely to the judgment of those interested. States which require the approval by a public tribunal of stock and bond issues made for consolidation and combination, such as Massachusetts and Texas, are avoided in the creation of such combinations. The States whose legislation is most lax in such matters are resorted to for corporate powers. The capitalization of all the railroads engaged in interstate commerce is about thirteen billions of dollars, about half in bonds and half in stock.

The bonds for the most part represent genuine investment; the stocks, it is claimed, have been largely watered.

The President in his message has called attention to the evils of overcapitalization in the following words:

"Of these abuses perhaps the chief, although by no means the only one, is overcapitalization—generally itself the result of dishonest promotion—because of the myriad evils it brings in its train; for such capitalization often means an inflation that invites business panic; it always conceals the true relation of the profit earned to the capital actually invested, and it creates a burden of interest payments which is a fertile cause of improper reduction in or limitation of wages; it damages the small investor, discourages thrift, and encourages gambling and speculation; while, perhaps, worst of all is the trickiness and dishonesty which it implies—for harm to morals is worse than any possible harm to material interests, and the debauchery of politics and business by great dishonest corporations is far worse than any actual material evil they do the public."

This measure does not reach this abuse.

CHANGES IN RAILROAD CONDITIONS SINCE 1887.

In the World's Work for October, 1905, appears an article by Professor Ripley, of Harvard University, entitled as above.

In this article Professor Ripley states that from 1889 to 1903, "While population and mileage increased one-third, the railroads in 1903 hauled the equivalent of two and a half times the total volume of freight traffic handled in 1889, the year of the earliest official statistics." He adds:

"If the freight business of the United States increased five times as fast as population or mileage in fourteen years, the imagination runs riot concerning its probable magnitude fifty or one hundred years hence."

In this article also appears the following statistical statement:

"Gross revenues of American railroads in 1889 were about $1,000,000,000, and in 1903 they were about one billion nine hundred millions. The preliminary figures for 1904 show that they have practically doubled in the brief period of fifteen years.

"The net income available for dividends has grown even faster. The increase to 1903 was, roughly speaking, about 250 per cent, namely, from one hundred millions in 1889 to three hundred and fifty-seven millions in 1903. There is every probability that by 1905 the net revenue will be more than fourfold the figures in 1889."

GROWTH OF CONSOLIDATION.

Professor Ripley speaks of the enormous growth of consolidation since 1887, and calls attention to the fact that before 1890 a 5,000-mile railroad was about the maximum, and that the next decade, 1900, witnessed the growth of systems of about twice that size. He then adds:

"Since then, not simply consolidations, but recombinations of systems, each in itself the result of antecedent consolidations, have made their appearance. The Morgan, Vanderbilt, Pennsylvania, Harriman, and Gould properties during the last five years attained lengths of 15,000 to 20,000 miles, and shall anyone be rash enough to predict that the end is yet in sight?"

In addition to this form of consolidation, Professor Ripley says:

"Great systems are quietly assuming control of their lesser and parallel rivals through investment of surplus funds in their securities. In this way trunk-line territory has been practically closed to competition. The New York Central has secured the Lake Shore, and through it purchased a large interest in the Philadelphia and Reading Railway. At the same time the Pennsylvania Company, through the Baltimore and Ohio, purchased control of its former troublesome rivals in the South, the Chesapeake and Ohio and the Norfolk and Western. The Baltimore and Ohio is also used by the Pennsylvania as a catspaw to assist in pulling the Philadelphia and Reading out of the fire of competition. The last company, thus jointly controlled at arm's length by the two great trunk lines, becomes the principal factor in the great anthracite coal combination, which includes four or five other companies. With the Vanderbilt and Morgan control of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and the Lehigh Valley, it will be apparent how little room there is for competition in this territory. The only free lance in any sense is the Erie, and rumor has it that the New York Central, through the Lake Shore and the Pennsylvania, is buying into its control at the present time."

INTERCORPORATE OWNERSHIP.

Under this heading Professor Ripley speaks of another form of consolidation which is going on. In fourteen years, he says, outstanding stocks and bonds of railroads owned by the public increased only 25 per cent, while railroad ownership of such securities increased four times as fast, or 100 per cent.

"In other words," says Professor Ripley, "railroad investments in other railroads have been growing about four times as fast as ownership by the general public, until in 1903 about one-fourth of the outstanding issues of railway stocks and bonds were owned by these corporations themselves."

This tendency has been accelerating during the past few years. Professor Ripley cites as an illustration the case of the Union Pacific Railroad, whose holdings five years ago of miscellaneous securities were about $11,000,000.

"In its annual report for 1904 this item is represented by $211,800,000, mainly stocks of other roads, with a few bonds. Including its holdings through auxiliary companies, its investments have grown in five years from $90,686,000 to $342,587,000."

Professor Ripley shows how suitable counterpoises of nonvoting stocks and bonds enable control of these parent companies to be held with comparative ease by a few men, and adds:

"This is our dilemma, then: Such an inverted financial pyramid, if it prove its worth, must unconsciously enrich the few who control it—the public danger of the overwealthy. If it threaten to prove topheavy it can be upheld only through larger exactions from the shipping and consuming public—extortionate rates; while, if it topple over, vast losses must come to the innocent public which provided nine-tenths of the real capital investment—witness widespread bankruptcy."

THE RISE IN RATES IN RECENT YEARS.

Professor Ripley, after showing that during the period from 1887 to 1900 a great reduction was accomplished in the ton mileage of the country and that it was the well-nigh universal opinion among traffic experts that these low freights had come to stay, states that the experience of the last five years had rudely shaken this belief, and that since 1900 freight rates have been sharply advanced, and that whilst opinions differ as to the exact degree and the relative justification of these increases, no denial of the fact is made. He goes on to show that most of the import traffic for the current season is being carried on less than tariff rates, and that a vast amount of freight is also moved on special or commodity rates for the purpose of enabling some shipper, who otherwise might not be able profitably to reach a certain market, to engage in competition for the trade, and that it is the common opinion of railroad men that approximately three-fourths of all the tonnage of the railroads goes on such schedules.

Assuming, therefore, that the rates on this proportion of the tonnage are fixed by competitive conditions that can not be raised at will, Professor Ripley argues that the burthen of making provision for additional revenue must fall upon the standard or high-grade freight, most of which is domestic and local. Accepting, therefore, the figures given by the carriers for the increase in ton-mile revenue of 5 per cent on all traffic and concentrating this entirely on one-fourth or one-fifth of the tonnage, Professor Ripley argues we should have an increase to 20 or 25 per cent between 1900 and 1903. This, he shows, has been accomplished, not so much by raising rates as by a change in classification, and in yet other ways by the abolition of demurrage, by increase in charges for switching and terminal delivery, by increased fees for icing refrigerator cars, or feeding or bedding stock, etc. He claims that great restlessness among the shipping public has been engendered by this increase of charges, mainly because "they indicate indubitably" the utter impotence of the public when the carriers all agree to act in unison.

THE VAST POWER OF THE UNITED RAILWAYS.

Under this heading Professor Ripley says:

"To-day the public, every merchant, and every community are confronted with the colossal power constituted of all the railroads acting in unison; this, too, in spite of antipooling and antitrust laws of the most stringent sort. It is the irresistible character and universal scope of these freight-rate changes which menace the future."

Professor Ripley quotes from a decision of the United States circuit court for southern Georgia concerning the increase of freight rates on lumber as fully illustrating this point, in which the court says:

"After a careful consideration of the extensive record there seems to have been an utter absence of excuse or justification for the concerted action of the railroads which advanced the rates on lumber throughout the South. * * * A highly significant feature of this case is the fact that the rates complained of are the result of concert of action on the part of the members of the Southeastern Freight Association. * * * In that territory, as regards every interest dependent upon the transportation of commodities, the action of the association is more authoritative than the firman of the Sultan or the ukase of the Czar. * * * The marked increase of charges did not originate from a normal or reasonable exigency of the respondent's business. On the contrary, it was an arbitrary exaction imposed by a combination of railroad agents made in restraint of the natural movement of the produce in the lumber trade."

IS CONSOLIDATION DESIRABLE AND LEGAL?

It may be safely stated that consolidation has for the most part resulted in greater economy and efficiency of operation, in better and quicker service, in a more equal service, and in stability of rates. As to whether it has worked a reduction of rates is disputed. The verdict of the people would probably be in favor of controlled consolidation and against uncontrolled consolidation. None of these consolidations have been tested in the courts except that accomplished through the agency of the Northern Securities Company. It was condemned and dissolved. It is probable that others are equally illegal, but there seems to be little disposition to attempt to break them up. Consolidation and merger of railroads engaged in interstate commerce constitute a part of the economic development of such commerce.

This measure provides no supervision or control over consolidation or merger.

CORPORATE ACTIVITY IN POLITICS.

The activity of these great railroad combinations in politics has been increasing ever since 1896. They are in politics because they feel that their property may be at any time the subject of attack either by legislatures or by administrative officers. Their vast property is between the upper and the nether millstone—the upper millstone of the rate-regulating power, the nether millstone of the taxing power. Between the two, save for the protection of the courts, they could be ground to destruction.

Participation in politics is stimulated by the uncertainty and insecurity of their situation. In the States, as a rule, they take part in the selection and election of officials whose duty is likely to trench in any degree upon the taxing and rate-regulating power. In addition to being subject to the control of Congress as to interstate rates they are subjected to the control of 45 different state legislatures or commissions as to the rates of state commerce. They are also taxed under 45 different systems embraced in the laws of as many States.

There is no certainty, no uniformity, no permanency. Thousands of local officials are engaged in making the valuations and fixing the tax rates. The railroads are therefore in politics, and as they do everything systematically their participation in politics means either organization of or identification with a machine in most of the States of the Union, and since, as a matter of business, they pursue the lines of least resistance, this often means alliance with corrupt elements of the communities in which they operate. Having been drawn into politics by the necessity for protection, they are likely to become aggressive and dominant in political control. It is expensive business for the railroads, and it is a grave menace to the institutions of the Republic.

This measure fixes no certain rules or principles for the ascertainment of either rates or taxes. It increases the uncertainty of the railroads; it will enlarge the area of their political activity.

UNDOUBTED POWERS OF THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

No one can question the power of the National Government to create corporations for the purpose of carrying out the powers intrusted to it by the Constitution. Under the granted powers of the Constitution we have created national banks, we have acquired and are now completing the Panama Canal, and have acquired the stock of and are operating the Panama Railroad. Under these powers we have also incorporated several railroads, among others the Union Pacific, the Atlantic Pacific, and the Texas Pacific railroads, the two former constructed through Territories, the latter constructed from a point in Texas to a point in California, all done under the powers granted in the Constitution to provide for the national defense, to establish post-offices and post-roads, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

Economic efficiency requires that the same railroad should accommodate both state and interstate commerce. State commerce is subject to the regulation of the State; interstate commerce is subject to the regulation of the United States. There should be no difficulty concerning the harmonious cooperation of the greater and the lesser sovereignties under a national incorporation act.

When I first introduced a joint resolution for the creation of a commission to frame a national incorporation act for railroads, I presented the view that it was unnecessary to seek either the cooperation or the consent of the States; that the United States had the power to create corporations for the transportation of interstate traffic; that it had the power to exempt the instrumentalities it chose for this purpose from all state burdens, either as to taxation or as to regulation of rates, upon the theory that the States could not put burdens upon national instrumentalities which might destroy their efficiency. But upon reflection I am convinced that it is wiser to secure the cooperation of the two sovereignties. I would suggest, therefore, the following legislation:

WHAT NATIONAL INCORPORATION SHOULD INCLUDE.

It is clear to my mind that we should have a national law for the incorporation of railways engaged in interstate commerce; that no corporation formed under it should be permitted to enter upon its work until its certificate of incorporation defining its purpose and powers should be submitted to and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission; that such corporation should not be permitted to commence construction or to purchase or acquire existing railroads until its plans and estimates are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission; that such corporation should not be permitted to issue its bonds or stock until the amount thereof and the consideration therefor are submitted to and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission after a public hearing; that all subsequent issues of stock and bonds should require a similar hearing and approval; that no existing railroad now owned by a corporation created by the laws of any State should be acquired or purchased without the consent of such State; that railroads so constructed and acquired by such national corporation should be subject to the reasonable police laws of the States in which they are operated; that the stock and bonds of such national corporations should be exempt from all taxation, but that the actual property and equipment of such corporations should be assessed by the States in which they are located at such percentage of its value as is customary and general, and should be taxed at the same rate as other property, or, better, that the State should levy a tax not exceeding 4 per cent upon such proportion of the gross receipts of the railroad as the mileage of such railroad within the State bears to the entire mileage operated; that nothing in the act should interfere with the power of the State to regulate the rates for the state traffic upon such railroad; that the Interstate Commerce Commission should make a valuation both of the road constructed and the road and equipment purchased or acquired and should make a record of the same, and that the issue of bonds and stock should equal such value and no more, and that all subsequent issues of stock and bonds should represent the actual value of property constructed or acquired; that such corporation should be authorized to collect rates which would yield gross receipts, which, after paying the expenses of operation, the cost of maintenance, the taxes, the interest [a] on debt, and other fixed charges should be sufficient to pay a dividend of 5 per cent per annum.

APPROVAL OF STOCK AND BOND ISSUES.

A national incorporation act should limit stock and bond issues to the cash paid in, or to the value of the property acquired, and so strict should this provision be that no issue of stock or bonds should be permitted save with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There are two States in the Union to-day whose corporate legislation is of the highest character—the State of Massachusetts and the State of Texas. In both of these States the railroad commission must approve the issues of stocks and bonds, and in Texas no stock or bond issue is legal unless the approval is indorsed upon the stocks or bonds.

What we wish to do is to nationalize either the system of Texas or the system of Massachusetts, and to denationalize the system of New Jersey. It is possible that we may have to use powers both of persuasion and of coercion in bringing in existing corporations under a national charter. It may be that we will have to validate a large portion of the capitalization already created, but if we can save the country from the overcapitalization of the future, even though we validate a large part of the overcapitalization of the past, we will confer a lasting benefit upon the American people.

A FAIR RETURN.

The return which national corporations are to have upon their capital should be a fair rate of interest on a fair valuation, and in giving the franchises to collect tolls we should provide that it should be exercised in such a way as to guard the public interest and save the public from extortion. The Supreme Court has declared that the railroads are public highways; that the right to collect tolls can not be exercised without a grant from the sovereign; that the tolls must be reasonable, and that in a judicial inquiry the reasonableness of the toll must be determined by a consideration of the value of the property employed in the public use, the gross receipts, the operating expenses, the cost of maintenance, the taxes, the interest on debts, etc., and that rates should be so adjusted as to yield, after all reasonable allowances, a fair return upon such valuation.

The best way of maintaining for all time the valuation of these roads is to have the capital stock express the real capital employed, and not a fictitious capital, and then we will know upon what amount a fair return should be paid. My own belief is that the return should be 5 per cent per annum with an allowance to the company for dividends of one-third of all profits that may be realized above 5 per cent, the remaining surplus profits to go toward a guaranty fund for dividends and an insurance or pension fund for employees. This would mean automatic regulation in time, so that the Interstate Commerce Commission would have almost nothing to do, for automatically as the business of the country increases the limitation on dividends would force the betterment of the railroads and the reduction of rates.

In Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 546) the Supreme Court says:

"We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And in order to ascertain that value, the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under the particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth."

And yet, although the Supreme Court has laid down the rule for the regulation of rates, as involving a fair return upon the value of the property affected, in the consideration of which certain factors are to be considered, such as the stock and bond issues, the actual cost, the actual cost of reproduction, etc., we in our legislation do not provide the factors by which the Interstate Commerce Commission can be guided. We should furnish them with the means of controlling the capitalization of these corporations, and if we do not enter upon a national incorporation of railways, we should at all events provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission should enter upon a valuation of the railroads, and to that valuation should be added from time to time the increases of bond and stock issues made by the corporation with the approval of the commission.

THE GOVERNMENT SHOULD DETERMINE WHAT SHALL BE A FAIR RETURN ON CAPITAL.

But there is another thing we can determine. We can determine the return upon capital. This is no innovation. It has existed throughout the history of this country. When we organized the Union Pacific Railroad we provided that the rates should be diminished after the income reached 10 per cent. In Massachusetts to-day the limitation upon the return on capital in electric railroads, which are being built all over the State, is 6 per cent, with an allowance of one-half of the additional profits to the corporation and the other half to be paid to the State.

The result is that nothing has ever been paid to the State. The corporation itself has never received the other half of the profits in the shape of dividends, but all excesses over 6 per cent have gone to the betterment and extension of roads and toward reasonable reductions of rates. The advantage of a limitation upon the dividend return on capital is that it works automatically either toward the betterment of the road, the reduction in rate, or to an increase of wages, all of which are to the interest of the country. Otherwise an increase of business tends simply to the increase of profit to the stockholder.

This system, while securing to him a fair return upon his investment, gives the balance of the profit, caused by an increase of population and an increase of business, to the public in the shape of the betterment of the road, in the shape of increased wages to employees, in the shape of reduced rates. If we enter upon a system of proper capitalization of these roads, involving a fair and fixed return in the shape of dividends, the Interstate Commerce Commission will hardly ever have cause to act, and automatically the entire administration of these roads will tend toward impartiality in place of partiality, to reasonable rates instead of unreasonable rates, to the betterment of roads instead of exhausting the roads with a view to paying dividends on watered capital.

AUTOMATIC ADJUSTMENT.

Thus we would have an automatic kind of adjustment under national control, which would do away not only with excessive rates, but all the abuses arising from preferences and discriminations as to individuals or localities. The tendency would be to equality and reasonableness of service.

TAXATION.

Then there is the question of a uniform system of taxation to be devised. Whenever the National Government creates a corporation for the carrying out of a great public purpose, and when the National Government uses the property of that corporation as an instrumentality for carrying out the powers conferred by the Constitution, it can, if it chooses, absolutely exempt such property from state burdens, for the power to tax involves the power to destroy. If it can do this, it can certainly do what I contend for, namely, lay down the rule by which States shall tax the property of such corporations within their boundaries.

We all know the looseness of the state laws regarding the taxation of railroads. We know that the range of assessment is a wide one; that the lesser degree of assessment is simply a valuation of the tracks and of the right of way, and that the higher degree of assessment involves the combined value of the stock and bonds. In addition to this the stock and bonds themselves in the hands of the stockholders can be assessed in most of the States, and thus we have a double system of taxation. As long as the taxation of railroads is subject to the conflicting laws of 45 different States is it to be wondered that railroads keep in politics? Can we throw ten billion dollars' worth of property into the political arena, subject to public control, both as to rates and to taxes, and then ask the ten billion dollars to keep out of politics?

The United States Government should fix a rational and fair rule for the taxation of national railroad properties which would leave nothing to discretion and which could be ascertained with mathematical certainty. Such a tax is a percentage tax upon gross receipts levied by the various States in proportion to mileage. It has the advantage of mathematical certainty and would relieve railroads of all necessity, so far as taxation is concerned, of interfering in politics.

Besides this, if the Interstate Commerce Commission is to fix the rates it is absolutely essential it should have all the factors for determining what is a fair return upon the capital invested, and one of those features is the allowance of the taxes; and if these taxes can be rudely disturbed from time to time by political action, involving violent readjustments, there can be no certainty either in the action which they take or in the rates for transportation which are the result of their action. Such legislation would be part of a rational adjustment of regulation, for it would involve not an absolute surrender to an Interstate Commerce Commission of the legislative powers belonging to Congress, but would involve the fixing of a rule working mathematically toward certain results and leaving the Interstate Commerce Commission the discretion and the judgment to work out the results according to the rule.

The difficulty with most of the propositions suggested for the fixing of rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission is that they confer upon an administrative tribunal all the legislative powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress in this matter, and it may be a serious question in the future as to whether the Congress can turn over all this power. It is claimed, of course, that Congress fixes the standard in declaring that all rates must be just and reasonable, and intrusts to the commission the duty only of adjusting the rates to the standard, but it must be remembered that the only power which Congress has over rates is to fix just and reasonable rates, and that in turning this power over to an administrative commission it delegates all the power it has. It may be a serious question as to whether Congress can go so far. A provision that the commission should value the property and should allow such rates as, after the allowance of operating expenses, interest on debt, fixed charges, etc., should yield a certain percentage on such value, would be sure to stand the test of the courts.

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

There are other provisions which a national incorporation act should contain. One is an insurance and pension fund for employees. One per cent of the gross receipts of all the railroads of the country, amounting at present to over $2,000,000,000 annually, would be $20,000,000 annually. This sum put into an insurance and pension fund, and invested under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, would yield ample returns for the relief of employees suffering from injury or old age. The charge should be frankly imposed on the public as one of the fixed charges of operation, and allowance should be made thereof in fixing rates.

The Interstate Commerce Commission should be made a board of conciliation as to all disputes between employees and the railroads. As it is, whenever there is a dispute between a railroad company and its employees, if they fail to agree, there is war—war which does not involve them only but which involves the entire country, threatening an impairment and even destruction of the commerce between the States and between communities. Can it be said that it is wise to adhere to a system which threatens at any time to paralyze trade and to lock up the activities of the entire country? I would not provide compulsory arbitration, but I believe that the conciliation of the Interstate Commerce Commission would be as effective in such matters as has been the conciliation of the railroad commission of Massachusetts in disputes between railroads and shippers.

THE NATION SHOULD ACT.

These are the questions which come before us in the consideration of national incorporation. We are considering questions of the national defense, of the national postal service, of the national commerce, and of foreign commerce—all of them intrusted by the Constitution to the representatives of the people of the United States in Congress assembled. We have not exerted these powers to the full. It is time that, in the interests of the entire country, we should assume the functions plainly given to us by the Constitution and provide with deliberation and judgment for their full exercise.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

It is plain that the people are restive under existing conditions. They realize that consolidation, capitalization, and return on capital are practically uncontrolled; that a few men in the great financial centers have almost absolute power in these matters; that our dual system of government tends to a confusion in control which practically exempts them from all control; that the complexity of the situation makes the railroad men the dominant power in politics; that the confusion of bond and stock issues, of stock watering, of leases, mergers, and combinations, absolutely paralyzes the judgment of the average right-thinking man, and is a fruitful source of corruption and fraud, political and financial.

They realize that the men who are prominent in the great industrial corporations are getting control over the transportation of the country, and that the union of control of the finances, the production, and the transportation of the country in the hands of a few has already created a plutocracy unsurpassed in wealth and power in the world's history, and that if this continues we are upon the threshold of still greater concentration of wealth and power.

They will look for simplicity in whatever plan of relief is proposed, and unless we unify and simplify the control of transportation in a few thoroughly controlled great national corporations whose finances and operations can be easily understood and whose functions will be entirely taken out of politics, they will drift to national ownership as the easiest solution.

The argument is a simple and taking one. If outside of the United States three-fifths of the trackage of the world is in national ownership, why should not America own her railroads? If the universal tendency is to the ownership by nations, why should not we follow their example? If the Nation can build the most gigantic public work of modern times, the Panama Canal, and if it can own and operate a from ocean-to-ocean railroad at Panama, why can it not build and own and operate lines through the United States from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf? If Chicago can contemplate the ownership of interurban railroads costing hundreds of millions, can not the Nation take in hand the ownership of interstate railroads costing billions? Such in brief is the argument in favor of national ownership. The method is not difficult.

It would be easy to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to institute suit to condemn the shares of stock in all the railroads in the country engaged in interstate commerce, leaving the bonds outstanding as a lien upon the property. Thus the interests of the stockholders would be purchased by the Nation, and the Interstate Commerce Commission could step into the position of directors of the various companies with their present organizations of officials and employees and could gradually work out a method of national administration. The present bond issues amount to about $6,000,000,000, bearing interest at about 4½ per cent, for which government bonds at 2½ or 3 per cent could be gradualy substituted as the railroad bonds matured, thus accomplishing a saving of $90,000,000 to $120,000,000 annually. The capital stock, whose par value aggregates about $6,000,000,000, and whose market value aggregates a little less, could be condemned at approximately the market rates and paid for by the sale of 2½ or 3 per cent United States bonds.

As the present annual revenue of all the railroads is over $2,000,000,000, it would furnish a sufficient sum to pay all the fixed charges of the companies and the low rate of interest upon the government bonds issued for the purchase of stock and produce a surplus which would make ample provision for betterments and extensions, and also provide a sinking fund which would extinguish the entire debt in fifty years. There can be no doubt about the legality of such a procedure. A similar bill was passed unanimously in the Senate at the last session, authorizing the condemnation of the stock of the Panama Railroad. By this method the Government would acquire without any revolutionary methods the control of all the railroads engaged in interstate commerce in the country, and assuming that the administration was honest and efficient the saving effected by the substitution of low-rate bonds for high-rate stock and the gradual retirement of existing bonds at much lower rates of interest would eventually pay for the roads.

Should the country determine to simply take hold of the railroad construction of the future, leaving the existing railroads in the hands of their present owners, the Government could easily build a railroad of 3,000 miles across the continent from Norfolk or Charleston to Los Angeles or San Diego, which would become the spinal column of a great governmental system. Government ownership presents no difficulties, either constitutional or practical, except, possibly, the difficulty of honest and efficient administration, and the country will certainly drift to it unless the existing abuses of uncontrolled monopoly, of overcapitalization, of accomplished union between the producing and transportation interests, of political control, and of unjust preferences and discriminations are done away with. Even assuming that the government management may not be as economical, the time may yet come when the people will regard equality of service as of more importance than economy of service. Such, briefly, is the argument for national ownership.

But I believe the policy I am advocating would give the country all the benefits of government ownership with none of its dangers. It would abolish the evils which have arisen from unrestricted monopoly, automatically bring about a reduction in rates, put the railroads out of politics, close the door against the entrance of over a million men into the political patronage, and retain the management of the able men whose genius created our present efficient system of transportation out of the crude conditions which prevailed a generation ago.

FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

There is little to be added to the foregoing, except to say that whilst the Hepburn bill has been efficacious in correcting many abuses, the evils of overcapitalization, of consolidation of competing lines, and of lack of control over great holding companies, have not been diminished. The valuation of railroads has not been made and the abuses of great consolidating and holding companies, created by an irresponsible sovereign, have not been abated.

NAVIGATION LINES.

It will be observed that the proposed amendment also covers the national incorporation of navigation lines. The agitation which has been inaugurated for the improvement of our inland waterways is constantly increasing in momentum, and public opinion now demands the expenditure of at least $50,000,000 annually under comprehensive plans which will tie the bays and sounds and inland waterways of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts together by coastal canals, which will secure the full development of our Pacific coast waters, which will connect the Great Lakes with the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, which will secure the full development of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, not only for navigation under the national power, but by the cooperation of the States, for irrigation, swamp-land reclamation, the utilization of water power, and every other useful purpose. These plans also involve the coordination of rail and water transportation by the improvement of transfer facilities and sites, and the cooperation of each with the other in diminishing the general cost of transportation. Such a system of waterways would vastly relieve the existing congestion of transportation. The perfection of the transportation system of the country will involve the creation by the Nation of common carriers which will not only own great trunk lines of railway, but also lines of steamers on the lakes, the rivers, and the ocean, thus bringing our foreign transportation in cooperation with domestic transportation, and perfecting a system similar to that of Germany, where rail, river, and ocean lines all work in harmony for the purpose of developing the trade of the country. Combination is an essential part of the development of transportation. A perfect system would involve, as far as possible, one control from shippers to consignee; and this can only be accomplished by transportation lines operating regardless of state or national boundaries, which will utilize the railways, the rivers, and the ocean by methods of carriage adapted to each.

If a proper system were created, most of the evils now complained of would disappear. A system of transportation could be easily devised which would enlist the best powers of the National Government without infringing at all upon the powers of the States, one which would protect alike the railway investor, the railway employee, the shipper, and the public in their respective rights, and at the same time protect the States in all their legitimate powers and change the hostility of the railways toward the waterways into friendly cooperation in the interest of the entire people.

THE PROCESS OF UNIONIZING.

The purpose of the Constitution was not to centralize, but to unionize, government where the general welfare was affected. We unionized the quarantine because we realized that disease had no respect for state lines; we unionized navigation because nature failed to place the rivers entirely within state boundaries; we unionized banking because the interest of the entire people required one money, a common denominator acceptable anywhere, and a system of exchange inviting universal confidence; and all the reasons which led to the unionizing of these functions of government in the past exist in far greater and stronger degree at this time with reference to the unionizing of transportation. We have just reached the threshold of this great question, and it is important that we shall start right by insisting that the Nation should create its own agents and not permit a lesser sovereignty to do so. All thoughtful men will agree that the mergers of the railways are necessary to the proper development of the transportation system of the country, and that the fullest powers of combination should be exercised, under proper restraints as to capitalization, rates, and profits. To break up these mergers and resolve them into their integral parts, bounded and circumscribed in their operations by state lines, would be a national calamity, as grievous to the public as to the railroads. Leaving out of consideration for the present the combination of competing lines, these mergers have been of immense service to the country, although the machinery for perfecting them has been most complicated. The thing complained of is not the fact of combination, but the methods of combination, ofttimes accomplished by evasion of the laws, unrestrained by adequate law, and fruitful of overcapitalization, frauds on stockholders, and frauds on shippers.

Appended hereto as an exhibit is the amendment which I shall offer as an additional section to the bill.

FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

APPENDIX A.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. NEWLANDS to the bill (S. 6737) to create a court of commerce and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes, viz: Add an additional section, as follows:

SEC. 18. (A) That any number of persons not less than fifteen may, under and subject to the requirements and conditions in this act provided, form a corporation for the purpose of constructing, equipping, maintaining, improving, and extending, and, as a common carrier, operating, a line or lines of railroad or navigation between points in different States of the United States, or between a State and a Territory, or in a Territory, or between a State and the District of Columbia, or between the United States and foreign countries, or for the purpose of acquiring by purchase or lease and operating any such line or lines of railroad or navigation already constructed or established, or for all of such purposes.

POWERS.

(B) That every corporation organized under this act shall have powers and be subject to restrictions as follows:

To assume a corporate name, and under such name to have corporate succession for a period stated in its certificate of incorporation, and if no other period be therein named, such succession shall be perpetual.

To sue and be sued in its corporate name.

To issue bonds and capital stock as hereinafter provided.

To adopt, use, and alter a corporate seal.

To elect all necessary officers and appoint managers and agents as hereinafter provided.

To hold, purchase, convey, mortgage, or lease such real or personal property as the lawful purposes of the corporation may require, including the right to acquire and hold the capital stock or bonds, or both, of other railroad corporations and corporations properly subsidiary or incidental to the management and operation of the railroad business, including navigation lines, and to lease the property of such other corporations: Provided, That such right to acquire and hold capital stock of other railroad corporations and corporations so subsidiary thereto shall be exercised only by a national railway corporation which itself operates the railroad or navigation lines of which the stock is so acquired and held.

To manage its business, make contracts, incur liabilities, and borrow money, subject to the requirements or provisions or other conditions in this act contained.

To make by-laws not inconsistent with the laws applicable to such corporation or the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

CAPITALIZATION.

(C) That such corporation shall provide for and issue only such amount of bonds and stocks as may be necessary for such construction or purchase or for the improvement or equipment of the railroad and navigation lines constructed, established, or acquired, together with the proper cost of organizing and promoting the company and the amount of capital reasonably required in addition for working capital. No bonds or stock shall be issued except for money paid or for property acquired at its actual cash value. The issuance of stock or bonds and the amount thereof shall in every case be subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall grant full public hearings in relation thereto, and of such hearings public notice shall be given by or under the direction of the commission. The United States shall be represented at such hearing by the Attorney-General or one of his assistants. The commission shall certify in writing to the incorporators or to the corporation its determination, and shall record the same in its records, and all bonds and stock not issued in compliance with such determination shall be void as against such corporation.

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION.

(D) That the original incorporators shall sign and acknowledge a certificate setting forth the following facts:

The name of the company, which shall contain the words "National Railway Company," and which shall not be the same as that of any other corporation organized under this act or sufficiently similar thereto to cause confusion therewith.

Nature of the business proposed to be engaged in.

Duration of corporate existence.

Principal place of business.

Route of railway already built.

Route of railway proposed to be built.

The proposed amount of bonds and stock, which shall be determined as provided in section 3, and the respective amounts, conditions, and privileges of the separate classes of stock, if it is desired to have more than one class.

The par value of the shares.

The number of shares subscribed by each incorporator.

The said certificate, together with the engineer's report provided for under section 6 in cases where such report is required, shall be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall direct such amendments therein or additions thereto as may be deemed necessary, and shall, when such certificate is in conformity to law and in other respects is approved by the commission, indorse the approval of the commission thereon, and record the said certificate, with such indorsement, and the day and hour of the submission of the approved certificate, in proper books kept by the commission for such purpose. The corporate existence shall commence with such day and hour, and such record and a duly certified copy thereof shall be prima facie evidence of such corporate existence.

FINDING OF PUBLIC NECESSITY.

(E) That in case such certificate shall provide for the construction or establishment of new lines of railroad or navigation, the commission, as a condition precedent to such corporate existence, and before approving such certificate, shall determine, after public hearing, whether public convenience and necessity require the building of such new lines, said determination and the method of arriving thereat to be in accordance with rules established by said commission. If such determination shall be to approve the construction aforesaid, it shall be recorded with said certificate of incorporation. If such certificate shall provide for the acquisition by purchase, lease, or otherwise, of any line already constructed or in course of construction, it shall be lawful for the commission, after hearing, to deny the filing of such certificate if, in its judgment, after public hearing, such acquisition would be detrimental to the public interest. But if the commission shall approve such acquisition as in the public interest its determination shall in like manner be recorded with said certificate of incorporation.

The construction, extension, or acquisition of additions to any line or lines of railroad or navigation, or the acquisition of any other lines or parts of lines or shares of stock in other companies as aforesaid, by any company incorporated under this act, is hereby prohibited unless and until such construction, extension, or acquisition shall receive the approval of the commission as of public necessity or in the public interest, upon application therefor duly filed and public hearing held; and any such approval shall be stated by the commission in writing, with its reasons therefor, and recorded in its records.

ENGINEER'S REPORT.

(F) That no certificate of incorporation provided for in this act shall be filed or recorded unless the same is accompanied by the sworn report of one or more skillful engineers, showing, as far as practicable, the character, structure, grades, cost of duplication, cost of construction, and the manner of construction of the road or roads, line or lines, proposed to be built, established, or required, and containing statements in relation to such other matters as rules adopted by the commission may require.

MEETING OF STOCKHOLDERS.

(G) That the commission shall establish rules governing the first and other meetings of stockholders, notices thereof and quorums required thereat, the election of the board of directors, executive committee, president and other officers of the company, and for the adoption of by-laws. Such rules shall provide for not less than 5 nor more than 15 directors, an executive committee of the board of directors, with managing powers, the election of a president, vice-president, treasurer, secretary, and such other officers as the by-laws shall require. The by-laws of the company shall not be effective until approved by the commission, as in accordance with its rules. The commission shall have authority to amend such rules from time to time as may, in its judgment, be required. The by-laws of the company shall provide for the removal of directors by vote representing two-thirds of the stock issued and outstanding at any annual or special meeting. Stock held in the company's treasury shall not be voted at any meeting.

STOCKS AND BONDS.

(H) That in case the entire stock shall not have been subscribed for prior to the filing of the certificate of incorporation, the directors shall open books of subscription to such stock in such manner as may be provided for by the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Before issuing the bonds of such corporation the amount and time and term thereof and the rate of interest must be approved by said commission. Before offering such bonds upon the general market they must be offered to the stockholders at not less than par, and thereafter such portion thereof as shall not be taken by the stockholders may be sold in the general market upon such notice as the Interstate Commerce Commission shall by rule prescribe.

CERTIFICATE OF ORGANIZATION.

(I) That when at least one-half of the capital stock shall have been subscribed for a majority of the directors shall make and swear to a certificate setting forth the following facts:

Names and addresses of directors;

Names and addresses of officers;

Amount of capital stock subscribed for;

Amount of capital stock paid for in other than cash, specifying separately and in detail the nature of such consideration and the total amount of stock separately allowed for other than cash;

All delegated powers conferred by the by-laws on others than the board of directors;

A complete and true copy of the by-laws of the corporation. And it shall be the duty of the board of directors, within thirty days after the passage of any vote, amendment, altering, repealing, or adding to the by-laws of the corporation, to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a complete and true copy of such vote, amendment, alteration, repeal, or addition;

Such certificate shall be submitted to the commission, and after having been amended under the direction of the commission to conform to the requirements of this section, if such amendment be necessary, the approval of the commission shall be indorsed thereon, and the certificate, with its indorsement, shall be recorded in full in a proper book kept by said commission for such purpose, together with the day and hour of the submission of the approved certificate, and said corporation may begin business on and after such time.

CAPITAL STOCK.

(J) That the par value of each share of stock shall be $100. No stockholder shall be liable for the debts of the corporation beyond the amount of his subscription to the capital stock, except as expressly provided in this act. Each stockholder shall be entitled to a certificate of stock, which shall evidence the amount of stock held by him. The stock shall be personal property; shall be transferable only on the books of the company, in such form as the by-laws may prescribe, and shall be subject to a lien in favor of the corporation for all debts due to said corporation from the owner of said stock. The stock may be sold for unpaid subscriptions in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules of the commission. Each share of stock shall entitle the holder of record to one vote, and in voting for directors any stockholder may cast his vote or any part thereof for one candidate, so as to exercise the privilege of a cumulative vote. Votes may be cast by proxies, and the form of such proxies and the list of stockholders entitled to vote shall be prepared as provided by the by-laws in accordance with the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Stockholders, by two-thirds vote of each class of stock, may create different classes of stock, either in the original or in subsequent issues, if the Interstate Commerce Commission shall find that the creation of such classes of stock is proper and necessary for the purposes of the corporation; and such stockholders may, by such vote, determine the preference, conditions, and privileges attaching to such classes, respectively: Provided, That preferred stock so issued, and any stock so issued other than common stock, shall have no voting powers.

BONDS.

(K) That the corporation may, by a majority vote of its stockholders, issue bonds, notes, or other evidence of indebtedness, but the total of all such obligations of the corporation shall be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

MEETINGS—INCREASE OR DECREASE OF STOCK.

(L) That annual and special meetings of stockholders shall be held, notices thereof issued, and quorums required thereat, in such manner and form as provided by the by-laws, in accordance with the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The stockholders shall have power to elect directors and by two-thirds vote to remove them; by majority vote to increase the issue of any class of stock, subject to the provisions of this act, and by such vote to decrease any class of stock.

Stockholders may also by such vote of each class of stock make any alteration or amendment in the certificate of incorporation of the company not inconsistent with law which it would have been lawful to insert or omit or make in its original certificate of incorporation, such alteration or amendment to be subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

REGULATION BY INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

(M) That all corporations organized under this act shall be subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof.

BOOKS AND RECORDS.

(N) That the treasurer shall keep proper books of account of all transactions of the corporation, and the secretary shall keep proper and full records of the transactions of all meetings of the stockholders, the board of directors, and the executive committee, and all of said books shall be open to the inspection of the commission at any time, and also to the inspection of any stockholder at any reasonable time and place. It shall be the duty of the respective officers having charge of such books and records to permit upon demand, after ten days' previous notice, such inspection by a stockholder, unless such right of inspection shall be enjoined as above provided.

REPORTS.

(O) That all corporations formed under this act shall make to the Interstate Commerce Commission such reports as are now by law required to be made to said commission, and such further reports as the rules of said commission shall from time to time require.

DISSOLUTION.

(P) That any such corporation may, after lawful private or public sale of the railway property and equipment, upon the vote of three-fourths of its capital stock, wind up and close its business and dissolve under such forms of procedure as to claims, distribution of assets, notice to creditors, publication of votes and certificates of dissolution as may be prescribed by the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

(Q) That any corporation organized under this act may acquire rights or property necessary for the proper execution of its corporate purposes, including right of way, sidings, terminals, depots, water rights, gravel, and stone. In case the corporation and the owner of such rights or property are unable to agree upon a price therefor and the same can not be acquired by agreement, the corporation may proceed in any competent court in the State or Territory where such property is located for the condemnation of such rights or property. Such proceedings shall be conducted pursuant to the existing statutes of such State or Territory regarding the condemnation of property for public use.

TAXATION.

(R) That railroads and navigation lines owned by corporations duly organized under this act are hereby declared to be instrumentalities for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. The franchises, stocks, bonds, fixed evidences of indebtedness, operations, and traffic, and the corporation itself shall not be subject to taxation by any State or Territory, but the property of such corporation situate in a State or Territory, including its right of way, its real estate, stations, office buildings and equipment, shall be subject to assessment at such average percentage of their actual value as shall be customary with reference to other property in such State or Territory, and to the customary taxes on such assessment.

STATE POLICE AND STATE RATES.

(S) That nothing herein contained shall be construed as interfering with the police laws of any State regarding railroads incorporated under this act and operating in such States, nor shall anything herein contained be construed as affecting the right and power of each State to regulate purely state commerce on railroads organized under this act. But the Interstate Commerce Commission shall hold conferences from time to time with the regulating power of any State with a view to such harmonious adjustment and regulation of state commerce and interstate commerce as will protect the public against abuses or extortion, and the railroads against inadequate returns upon their investment, and as will promote the efficiency of such corporations as common carriers. With such end in view the said commission shall call and hold at least once each year a conference with the railroad commissioners of the several States, and with other state officers having any duty of supervision, taxation, or regulation of railroads within their respective States. Such conference shall be held in the District of Columbia, and the presiding officer at such conference shall be the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some other member of said commission designated by its chairman. The proceedings of such conference shall be printed or distributed by or under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

ACQUISITION OF STATE RAILROADS.

(T) That such corporation may, with the consent of any State, upon the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, acquire the railroad of any corporation now organized under the laws of such State, and may issue for the purchase thereof such amount of bonds and stock as may be authorized by said commission, but such authorization shall only be made after a full public hearing, at which the Attorney-General shall appear, either personally or by one of his assistants, and no issue of bonds or stocks therefor shall exceed the value of such road as ascertained by said commission.

With the consent of the State under which any railroad corporation is or may be organized, merger between the corporation owning such road and a corporation organized under this act may be accomplished under this act; and bonds and stock may be issued by any corporation organized under this act for such purpose: Provided, That such proposed merger is approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the amount of the bonds issued, together with the rate of interest thereon, and of the stock issued in the accomplishment of such merger, are also approved by said commission. Such issues of bonds and stock may include a reasonable allowance for the expenses of merger and promotion. Such merger shall not include transportation lines which are directly or substantially competitive.

ACCIDENT AND INSURANCE FUND.

(U) That it shall be a condition of the grant and continuance of any franchise to do business under this act that the corporation holding such franchise shall set aside annually a percentage of the gross receipts of said corporation, not exceeding 1 per cent, to be held as a fund in the Treasury of the United States for the payment of pensions to the employees of such corporation who shall have been disqualified for active service, either by injury in the service or by age. The conditions entitling employees to pensions, the amount and time of payment, the investment of the fund, the disbursing of the same, and the entire management thereof shall be under rules and regulations to be made, and from time to time amended, by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

BOARD OF CONCILIATION.

(V) That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to act as a board of conciliation between corporations organized under this act and their employees as to any dispute arising between such corporation and their employees in the matter of compensation, hours, and conditions of labor, the protection of life and limb of said employees, and such power shall be exercised by said commission in accordance with the rules and regulations to be made and from time to time altered by said commission. All powers and duties now exercised by the chairman of said commission and the Commissioner of Labor under the act entitled "An act concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees," approved June 1, 1898, are hereby transferred to, vested in, and required of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

PENALTIES.

(W) That no corporation organized under this act shall make any expenditure whatever for the purpose of aiding or defeating any political party or candidate for office, and for every such offense such corporation shall be subject to a fine of —— dollars.

Any officer, director, or agent of such corporation who shall willfully make, assist in making, cause or direct to be made, any false statement, material misrepresentation, or false entry in any book, report, return, account, or certificate required by or under this act to be kept shall be, upon conviction, subject to a fine of not more than —— dollars, or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, and shall furthermore be liable in a civil action for damages caused to any creditor or stockholder thereby.

Any officer, director, or agent of such corporation who shall willfully refuse or neglect to perform any duty imposed upon him by this act, for which refusal or neglect a penalty is not herein otherwise expressly provided, shall be subject, upon conviction, to a fine of not more than —— thousand dollars or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Any corporation organized under this act which shall fail to conform to and comply with any of the requirements, or observe any of the prohibitions, in this act contained shall be subject, upon conviction, to a fine of not less than —— dollars nor more than —— dollars, and each day of the continuance of such failure shall be deemed a separate offense.

All fines collected under this act shall be paid into the accident and insurance fund herein provided.

DIVIDENDS.

(X) That no corporation organized under this act shall pay or distribute to its stockholders in any form, during any one year, a dividend or dividends exceeding in total amount 7 per cent upon its capital stock without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If, after the payment by such corporation of its operating expenses, maintenance, improvements and betterments, its taxes, its interest on bond or on other indebtedness, and its contribution to the accident and insurance fund, there shall be a surplus over and above the amount necessary to pay such dividend of 7 per cent per annum, such surplus shall be reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which may direct the same to be applied, in whole or in part, to betterment of the road or equipment, or to extra dividends, or to a guaranty fund in the Treasury of the United States against future inadequacy of earnings or reduction in dividends, such fund to be controlled and invested under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

JURISDICTION OF SUITS BY AND AGAINST RAILWAY COMPANIES.

(Y) That any corporation organized under this act shall, for the purpose of all actions by or against it, real, personal, or mixed, and all suits in equity, be deemed a citizen of every State in which its lines are located, and in such cases circuit and district courts of the United States shall not have jurisdiction other than such as they would have in cases between individual citizens of the same State. The provisions of this section shall not be held to affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in cases by the United States, or by direction of an officer therein, or cases for winding up the affairs of any such corporation.

Any case involving the recovery of fines or penalties under this act may be brought in the circuit court of the United States for any judicial district wherein the corporation has its principal office or through which the line or any part thereof may run. In every such case, for the purposes thereof, the jurisdiction of the court shall be coextensive with the territory of the United States, and in writs of subpœna, removal of persons, execution, and all other process shall run throughout the United States. All existing laws pertaining to the taking and compelling of testimony in cases arising under the act to regulate commerce, or its amendments, shall apply in cases arising under this act.

RULES.

(Z) That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make and from time to time alter, amend, or repeal rules necessary for the complete enforcement of the provisions of this act.

AMENDMENT OR REPEAL.

(ZZ) That this section and all franchises acquired under it shall be at all times subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by act of Congress.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

By Mr. LODGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a tablet to the monument commemorating the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown, Mass.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 6287) to codify, revise, and amend the postal laws of the United States, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order is made.

Mr. CARTER. In lieu of that bill I introduce a bill which bears certain amendments and improvements on the bill as originally introduced, it being for the same purpose.

The bill (S. 6970) to codify, revise, and amend the postal laws of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

YELLOWSTONE FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the repair and improvement of the east and south roads in the Yellowstone Forest Reserve, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $140,000 for improving Charlotte Harbor, Florida, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the improvement of Lake Crescent and Dunns Creek, Florida, from St. Johns River to Crescent City, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $23,200 for improving the upper Machodoc Creek, Virginia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for contract or contracts for materials and work for improving the Ohio River to $3,500,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the completion of the improvement of the Ohio River within a period of twelve years to $1,150,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for improving the harbor at Fairport, Ohio, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for improving the Kentucky River, Kentucky, to $206,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the completion of the improvement of the Ohio River within a period of twelve years to $1,500,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,250,000 for improving the Delaware River, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, between Allegheny avenue, Philadelphia, and the sea, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment providing for a survey of the outer harbor of Los Angeles Harbor, California, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

THE POSTAL LAWS.

On motion of Mr. CARTER, it was Ordered, That 3,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 6970) to codify, revise, and amend the postal laws of the United States be printed for the use of the Senate.

CEMETERY LAND AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call us from the calendar the bill (H. R. 19558) to authorize the Secretary of War to effect an exchange of a certain parcel of land owned by the United States for another parcel owned by the Cave Hill Cemetery Company, of Louisville, Ky.

I will state that the object of this bill is to enable the Secretary of War to exchange a certain small piece of land for another piece owned by the Cave Hill Cemetery Company, looking to the protection and enlargement of the space set apart for the burial of federal soldiers. I will ask that the Senate allow this bill to be taken up now and passed, as it is important that is should be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANA SHOALS LIGHT-VESSEL.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 6230) to provide for the transfer of light-vessel No. 56 to Gary Harbor, Indiana.

The Secretary read the bill and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 10, to strike out "numbered" and insert "number," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon the establishment of White Shoal light-station, Lake Michigan, to transfer and station light-vessel No. 56, now marking that station, to a point about 7 miles northerly of Gary Harbor, Indiana, in approximately the position now occupied by the gas-lighted and bell buoys marking Indiana Shoals; said vessel to be known as Indiana Shoals light-vessel No. 56.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the transfer of light-vessel No. 56 to Gary Harbor, Indiana."

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order.

DAVID ROBERTSON.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4196) to place David Robertson on the retired list of the United States Army.

Mr. KEAN. After this bill is disposed of I shall insist on the regular order.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes, in consequence of the long, faithful, and meritorious service of David Robertson, under appointment of the Secretary of War, as hospital steward, and sergeant, first class, Hospital Corps, in the Army of the United States since May 27, 1854, a period of fifty-five years, the Secretary of War to place David Robertson on the retired list of enlisted men of the army, with full pay of his grade and commutation of allowances at the following rates per month: Clothing, $4.56; rations, $30; and fuel and quarters, $20.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. I ask for the regular order.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to call up House bill 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 18162) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached in the reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," on page 1, line 11, before the word "solicitor," to strike out "one;" and in line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert "and hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the solicitor," so as to read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; solicitor, $4,500, and hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the solicitor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the Secretary of Agriculture, on page 2, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert "one law clerk, $2,500;" in line 14, before the word "law," to strike out "two" and insert "ten;" in the same line, after the word "each," to insert "seven law clerks, at $1,800 each;" and in line 16, after the word "each," to insert "Provided, That the law clerks may be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for service in or out of Washington," so as to read:

One inspector, $2,500; 1 law clerk, $2,500; 10 law clerks, at $2,000 each; 7 law clerks, at $1,800 each; 3 law clerks, at $1,600 each: Provided, That the law clerks may be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for service in or out of Washington.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from Iowa ought to explain the enormous increase in law clerks, and so forth, at the beginning of the bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The first amendment, which was adopted, was to insert:

And hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the solicitor.

That is followed by a transfer to the solicitor's office of the law clerks now on the roll of the Forestry Bureau, a roll that is not statutory. This transfer involves no increase either in number or in the salary of the clerks. The amounts that are put down in this paragraph as salaries are taken away from the lump fund heretofore appropriated for the Forestry Bureau.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa in regard to the first amendment, which it would seem transfers the legal work of the department to a solicitor of the department. Is that intended to take it entirely away from the legal department of the Government?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Oh, no; it is intended to take it away from the legal department of the Forestry Bureau, putting all these clerks under the direction of the solicitor of the department and giving the Secretary the right, if they are needed in the field, to send them out from the solicitor's office.

Mr. HEYBURN. I see. It centers all the legal work in the law department.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is the idea.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 12, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one hundred and ninety-eight thousand seven" and insert "two hundred and twenty-nine thousand eight," so as to make the clause read:

Total for office of the Secretary, $229,870.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before leaving that department, on page 2, line 13, I notice that the number of law clerks is raised to 10. Is that by reason of concentration, or is it an addition?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is no addition.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is concentration?

Mr. DOLLIVER. They are taken from the lump-fund account of the Forestry Bureau and put here, the lump fund of the Forestry Bureau being accordingly diminished.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Weather Bureau," on page 6, line 23, after the word "stations," to insert "including cooperation with other bureaus of the Government and societies and institutions of learning for the dissemination of meteorological information," so as to make the clause read:

General expenses, Weather Bureau: For carrying into effect in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, the provisions of an act approved October 1, 1890, so far as they relate to the weather service transferred thereby to the Department of Agriculture, and for every expenditure requisite for and incident to the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of meteorological observation stations, including cooperation with other bureaus of the Government and societies and institutions of learning for the dissemination of meteorological information, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 9, before the word "hundred," to strike out "nineteen thousand nine" and insert "twenty thousand four," so as to make the clause read:

For the employment of professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, research observers, observers, assistant observers, operators, skilled mechanics, repair men, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, $620,410.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 23, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For rent of offices and repairs to buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia and care and preservation of grounds, including construction of sidewalks on public streets abutting Weather Bureau grounds, $82,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "seven," so as to make the clause read:

For telephone rentals and for telegraphing, telephoning, and cabling reports and messages, rates to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture by agreements with the companies performing the service, $265,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 25, before the word "hundred," to strike out "ninety-two thousand one" and insert "ninety-three thousand six," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,293,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twenty-three thousand two" and insert "twenty-four thousand seven," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Weather Bureau, $1,524,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 9, line 9, before the word "clerks," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "eighteen;" in line 15, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one architect, $1,400," so as to read:

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 editor and compiler, $2,000; 4 clerks, class 4; 5 clerks, class 3; 18 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 15 clerks, class 1; 14 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 3 clerks, at $840 each; 5 clerks, at $720 each; 1 clerk, $700; 1 instrument maker, $1,200; 1 messenger and custodian, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "general expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 11, line 5, after the word "purposes," to insert "and for the enforcement of section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,'" so as to read.

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts, to permit and regulate the movement of cattle and other live stock therefrom, and for other purposes, and for the enforcement of section 62 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States;" and for carrying out the provisions of the act of June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "general expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 11, line 23, after the word "best," to insert "to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same whenever in his judgment essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another," so as to read:

To purchase in the open market samples of all tuberculin serums, antitoxins, or analogous products, of foreign or domestic manufacture, which are sold in the United States, for the detection, prevention, treatment, or cure of diseases of domestic animals, to test the same and to disseminate the results of said tests in such manner as he may deem best; to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same whenever in his judgment essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 4, to insert:

For all necessary expenses for the equipment of a bureau experiment station, including the necessary construction and alterations of buildings thereon, the construction and repair of fences, roadways, drains, and other incidental work, $12,000.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to have a semicolon inserted instead of a period after the word "dollars."

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," insert a semicolon in lieu of a period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so amended, and the amendment as amended will be agreed to, without objection.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "thirty-four," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,234,540.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and eighty-eight" and insert "four hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $1,400,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Plant Industry," in the item of appropriation for "Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 15, line 13, before the word "laborers," to strike out "skilled," and in line 14, before the word "laborers," to strike out "skilled," so as to read:

Six laborers, at $540 each; 19 laborers, messengers, or messenger boys, at $480 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "fifty-five," so as to make the clause read:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $255,155.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. At the end of that paragraph I desire to have the semicolon omitted and these words inserted: "Ten thousand dollars of which shall be immediately available."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 13, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and insert a comma and the words "ten thousand dollars of which shall be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 20, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-eight" and insert "ninety-eight," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,198,346.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 3, before the word "electric," to strike out "and," so as to read:

Gas, electric current—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-three," and insert "sixty-three," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $1,763,206.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 20, on page 13.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, the next provision is that relating to the Forest Service. I ask that the paragraphs referring to the Forestry Bureau be passed over for the present, that the reading be continued of the subsequent parts of the bill, and that we return to the Forestry Bureau later.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I ask: Will he allow amendments to be offered to this bill now, other than committee amendments?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should prefer that we first dispose of the committee amendments.

Mr. CLAY. I hope the Senator will call my attention to the matter before the bill is completed, so that I may have an opportunity to offer an amendment which I desire to submit.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I shall be very glad to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the paragraphs relating to the Forest Service be temporarily passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say that I desire the reading of the bill resumed at page 42, with the provision relating to the Bureau of Chemistry.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 42, line 3. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Bureau of Chemistry," on page 44, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "forty," so as to make the clause read:

For all expenses necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including chemical apparatus, chemicals and supplies, repairs to apparatus, rent, gas, electric current, official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, $240,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven hundred and ninety-one" and insert "eight hundred and sixteen," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $816,340.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 19, to insert:

Denatured alcohol: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to demonstrate and illustrate the methods for the making of denatured alcohol on a scale suitable for utilization by the farmer, or associations of farmers, including salaries and the employment of labor and all other expenses, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $25,000, which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight hundred and seventy" and insert "nine hundred and twenty," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Chemistry, $920,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Division of Accounts and Disbursements," on page 51, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert "1 chief of office of accounts and fiscal agent, who may be detailed to the Forest Service for duty in or out of the city of Washington, $2,500; 8 district fiscal agents, at $2,000 each, who may be detailed to the Forest Service for duty in or out of the city of Washington," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Division of Accounts and Disbursements: One chief of division and disbursing clerk, who shall be administrative officer of the fiscal affairs of the department, $3,250; 1 assistant chief of division, $2,500; 1 chief of office of accounts and fiscal agent, who may be detailed to the Forest Service for duty in or out of the city of Washington, $2,500; 8 district fiscal agents, at $2,000 each, who may be detailed to the Forest Service for duty in or out of the city of Washington.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think I ought to say at that point that the officials described in this amendment are not new officials, but are the present officials of the Bureau of Forestry transferred to the Secretary's office and consolidated in the Bureau of Accounts of the office of the Secretary, a proper corresponding deduction being made from the lump appropriation for the Forestry Bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 52, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "sixty-one thousand four" and insert "seventy-nine thousand nine," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Division of Accounts and Disbursements, $79,990.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Division of Publications," on page 52, line 11, before the word "editor," to strike out "associate" and insert "assistant," so as to read:

Salaries, Division of Publications: One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,000; one editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,250; one chief clerk, $2,000; one assistant editor, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 20, before the word "one," where it first occurs, to insert "at," so as to read:

Six draftsmen or photographers, at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Office of Experiment Stations," on page 62, after line 4, to insert:

Drainage investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on drainage, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all necessary expenses, $78,860.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In view of the fact that that is the largest apparent increase the Senate committee propose over the bill as it came to the Senate, I think I ought to say that this provision has been in the law continuously since 1903. It has been included in the estimates of the department, and has been favorably reported to the House by its committee. It was there omitted from the bill upon a point of order. It involves a very useful work in many parts of the country, and, of course, ought not to be abruptly discontinued. In fact, it can not be discontinued without great waste and loss. For that reason the committee thought it best to restore it to this bill as it stands in the appropriation for 1910.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 62, line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nine hundred and eighty-eight thousand nine hundred and sixty" and insert "one million sixty-seven thousand eight hundred and twenty," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Office of Experiment Stations, $1,067,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Office of Public Roads," on page 64, after line 13, to strike out:

Total, Department of Agriculture, for routine and ordinary work, $13,330,276.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, after line 16, to insert:

MISCELLANEOUS.

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to investigate the cost of food supplies at the farm and to the consumer, and to disseminate the results of such investigation in whatever manner he may deem best, this authorization to be effective upon the approval of this act.

Mr. DOLLIVER. At that point, after the word "act," I desire to move to strike out the semicolon and substitute a period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I also desire that the proviso which follows be printed as a separate paragraph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proviso which follows will be inserted as a separate paragraph, but the Chair would suggest to the Senator that under these circumstances probably it would be better to omit the word "Provided."

Mr. DOLLIVER. Possibly. That is agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done, and the amendment will be stated, omitting the word "Provided."

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 64, line 22, after the word "act," to insert:

That hereafter the maximum salary of any scientific investigator in the city of Washington, or other employee engaged in scientific work, paid from the general appropriation, shall not exceed $4,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, after line 2, to insert:

Total carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture, $13,512,636.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to make several inquiries of the Senator from Iowa, who is in charge of the bill. Does this paragraph relating to the investigation of the cost of food supplies contemplate the employment of experts and clerks for that special work or is it intended that the officials of the department already employed shall perform this service?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is intended to involve no additional expense whatever, but to enable the Secretary, within his discretion, to employ those traveling experts who are already on the roll of the department in securing information which will enable him to make intelligent reports upon these matters.

Mr. BURTON. Then it is a detail of work for those who are already on the roll of the department?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes. It involves no additional expense, and is intended simply to give the Secretary a certain assurance of law for doing what he has always been doing under the general provisions of the law. He asked this special authority because he did not desire to proceed without authority of law, even in matters in which the department had been accustomed to act.

Mr. BURTON. As I understand, the paragraph beginning "Provided, That hereafter" is not responsive to the paragraph immediately before it, but pertains to the whole bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That has nothing to do with it. That is the reason I asked that it be set in a paragraph by itself. The purpose of that paragraph is to enable the Secretary to exercise a little more discretion in the assignment of salaries to scientists in his employ who are paid not from the statutory roll, but out of a lump fund, for their employment. It very often happens that it is impossible to retain the service of men of very great value to the department because the limit upon the right to pay the salary is too low. I think it is now $3,000, and we are in the situation of having the greatest experts of the department pulled away. For example, the great veterinary expert, the most expert of all men on questions affecting the diseases of animals, and especially tuberculosis, has been solicited to become the president of the veterinary college in Philadelphia, on a salary so much larger than the Secretary is at present authorized to pay that it would be a very great temptation; and it was the theory of the Secretary that he ought to be able to retain these expert investigators in the department, if it could be done by a reasonable addition to the discretion which he now exercises in fixing their salaries.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question also in regard to the scope of the paragraph beginning in line 5, page 64:

And not to exceed 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office herein provided for shall be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, or office—

And so forth.

Does that mean that in any bureau, division, or office an addition of 10 per cent can be made to the miscellaneous expenses; that they can spend more, by 10 per cent, than the appropriation herein contained?

Mr. DOLLIVER. This has been a provision of law for two years, I think, and is intended to enable the Secretary, where funds are fixed and available for specific work in a bureau and, as sometimes happens, not all of the money appropriated for a particular project is used, to transfer a portion of it to another project in the same bureau where the appropriation is deficient. That has been recognized as an economical administration of the funds. It is quite impossible to tell exactly what lump appropriation should be made for each of these particular purposes in the subdivisions of the work of a given bureau.

Mr. BURTON. Then, it is utilizing the amount for these different bureaus according to the exigencies that arise and the different demands upon them?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is the theory upon which it has been done.

Mr. BURTON. It does not increase the aggregate amount that can be expended?

Mr. DOLLIVER. In no way. It simply makes the fund somewhat interchangeable, according to the exigencies of the service in its different bureaus.

Mr. PURCELL. May I ask a question, please?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. PURCELL. On page 2, line 13, the bill speaks of law clerks. Does the term "law clerk" mean a person learned in the law and admitted to practice?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think it has not the dignity of the word "solicitor;" possibly not the dignity of the word "lawyer." But these men are usually lawyers, young lawyers, who are appointed for law service in the various departments of the Government; the same grade of men, I apprehend, who would be found in the Land Office.

Mr. PURCELL. I move to strike out, if that is proper at this time, the first proviso in line 16, on page 2, being all of line 17 and all of line 18, with the exception of the word "one" and what follows. In other words, strike out the proviso reading:

Provided, That the law clerks may be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for service in or out of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that these amendments having been agreed to, it is not now competent to move to amend them, but when the bill reaches the Senate it will be in order to do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill in regard to these law clerks. The House bill provided for five with salaries aggregating $8,800. The Senate bill provides for 21 with salaries of $39,900. I understood the Senator to say that that sum has been taken from the lump sum for the Forestry Bureau. On turning to that item I find no amendment reducing that appropriation, except two, one for fighting forest fires and other unforeseen emergencies—for which purpose I do not suppose they employ law clerks—where there is a reduction of $10,000; and the other is in the item "for the purchase and maintenance of all necessary field, office, and laboratory supplies, instruments, and equipment," where there is some reduction. Those are the only two reductions I find in the various appropriations for the Forestry Bureau. I ask the Senator where the reduction is made?

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator will observe the bill on page 42 he will find a reduction of $49,600 in the aggregate, and that represents the transfer of these law clerks from the lump fund for the Forestry Bureau to the statutory roll in the Secretary's office.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes; but I am asking where these clerks are struck out of the Forestry Bureau's items?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The clerks are not specifically mentioned in the Forestry Bureau appropriation. The peculiarity and, as we think, a rather vicious peculiarity of the appropriation, is that it is a lump sum to be administered by the department without any statutory regulation of salaries; and if the Senator will compare the expenditures of the Forestry Bureau of last year, as printed in a public document, he will find that these exact amounts were actually paid to law clerks and others out of the lump forestry sum. The sole purpose and the exact effect of this amendment is to transfer these people, who are engaged in law business or semilaw business in the Forestry Bureau, to the roll of the Secretary's office, so that they may all be under the control of the solicitor of the department. I will say to the Senator that these calculations have been made by the department in exact estimates. It is true that the lump sum available for the Forest Service is reduced by the exact amount of the salaries of these clerks, who are transferred from that bureau to the Secretary's office.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir; but I find that the reduction is made in these two items: For fighting forest fires the House appropriated $145,000. The Senate reduced that item by $10,000. Then for the purchase and maintenance of necessary field, office, and laboratory supplies, instruments, equipment, it reduced the House bill from $266,600 to $221,040. Those items were specifically appropriated for this service, and it was not for law clerks. I do not suppose they use law clerks in fighting forest fires or in purchasing field or office and laboratory supplies.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is true, and yet if the Senator will examine the expenditures of the lump sum of the Forestry Bureau the last year he will find that there was paid out for a law officer, $3,000; for assistant law officer, $2,700; law examiner, $2,750; law examiner, $1,800; law examiner, $1,800; law examiner, $1,500; law clerk, $1,800. Now, it is provided to reorganize, and the salaries are carried to the Secretary's roll, and by that means the lump fund, not for fighting forest fires, but the general lump sum which the Forester has heretofore administered is diminished by the exact amount of these transfers.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand that, but the reduction in the general lump sum is made up of these minor lump sums, for fighting fires and for the purchase of necessary field and office supplies, and there is certainly no necessity for any employment of law clerks in those two fields of operation.

Mr. DOLLIVER. As the bill came from the House the total for Forest Service was $5,057,700, and as it stands in the bill as the Senate Committee has amended it, the total for Forest Service is $5,801,000, a reduction of $49,600 in the total appropriation. Thirty-one thousand nine hundred dollars of it covers the law clerks who are transferred to the statutory roll, and $18,500 covers the transfer of the fiscal agents of the Forestry Bureau to the roll of the Division of Accounts in the Secretary's office.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I give notice, Mr. President, that I shall insist upon the bill being amended by striking out this increase of law clerks.

Mr. WARREN. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, with reference to what the Senator from North Dakota said, and his desire to strike out the proviso to which he has referred, that the law clerks may be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for service in or out of Washington, I will say that the necessity for that is caused by this transfer. Under the law the statutory roll for Washington provides that the officers shall be employed here in Washington, and usually in the provision for lump sums the proviso prevents the lump appropriation being used for employees inside of Washington. By the transfer of all the law clerks to the statutory roll it would leave the service without any lawyers outside or without the power expressed to send them out. I do not apprehend that it increases the expenses at all, but I understand this is desired so that they may be interchangeable as to service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill about a couple of items that I presume are all right, and yet I am a little puzzled over them. Did I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that this provision, inserted by the committee of the Senate, relating to drainage, had been in the bill for a great many years?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I made that statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the same amount appropriated each year? In this proposed amendment $78,860 is appropriated to continue this investigation, if it is a continuing investigation. I understood the Senator to say it had been in the bill since 1903. Has there been an appropriation for this purpose each year during the last seven years?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will read the provisions of the present law:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on drainage, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all necessary expenses, $81,160.

So the appropriation is somewhat less than it was last year and corresponds to the estimates of the Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I particularly wanted to ascertain was during how many years have we been making a similar appropriation? If it is true that we have been making it since 1903, we have already spent a half a million dollars, more or less, in these investigations.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think the original appropriations were smaller, possibly.

Mr. WARREN. If the chairman will permit me, I think this grew out, in the first place, of using a portion of the fund for irrigation investigation. It was probably a very small amount, possibly $5,000 or $10,000 originally, and, finally, was something more than $100,000. I think, in the first place, it was provided that some part of the irrigaton lump sum might be used for drainage investigation. It was put in a separate paragraph a few years ago. In the House bill this year drainage was inserted in the same manner as we have it now, and in the Senate bill it was stricken out on a point of order; the point of order being, I believe, that which has been applied to other parts of the bill, that the charter or original authority for the Agricultural Department was insufficient to cover it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not interested at all as to what the other body did in this connection. I am trying to get information as to how much money we have spent for this investigation, which it seems is not yet completed, and in trying to get an idea as to how much money we are going to spend to get a completed investigation relating to a matter which I think is a very grave departure from ordinary legislation.

We have legislated to put water on arid land. Now it is proposed that we shall legislate to take water from land that has too much of it. If we could only transfer the water to the arid land, I should think it would be good legislation. But if we are going to drain all the swamps of this country I think we are entering upon a great big scheme of expenditure.

I want further to inquire of the Senator where these investigations have been made. Have they covered the entire country?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WARREN. They are intended, of course, to cover the entire country, but attention has been called more sharply to it by the fact that irrigation of the lands brings out the necessity of drainage, accompanying it or following it, as to some portions of the irrigated land. But I think a large portion of the attention given to drainage to-day is given to the older districts that have for years irrigated their lands and where there is necessity of underdraining to correct the alkaline and other substances.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will add that it is hard to see why it is more important to get water on the land than it is to get it off. There are a good many million acres of land in this country which are totally useless by reason of a surplus of surface water. The department has been of great use even in those communities which pay the expense of draining their own land. I know that this division of the Department of Agriculture has sent experts to several counties in Iowa simply to advise the people there as to the best method of draining.

Mr. CLAY. Do I understand the Senator to say that they are using this money for the purpose of draining the private lands of individuals?

Mr. DOLLIVER. There are public schemes of drainage in nearly every State, which involve vast areas.

Mr. CLAY. I was reading this amendment, and I do not see how the Senator from Wyoming can draw the conclusion he did in regard to it. I understood the Senator from Wyoming to say that under this amendment the money heretofore appropriated has been used largely where arid lands have been reclaimed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. This amendment is not on that line, to be sure, for it says:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage and for the preparation and illustration of reports, etc.

That is surely——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Georgia does not comprehend that drainage may be connected with irrigation.

Mr. CLAY. I thought you had no water where you had to have irrigation.

Mr. WARREN. Water from irrigation oftentimes forms reservoirs and wet lands and swamps, and the subject is a more difficult one to handle than with the ordinary land, because of the alkali and other substances that make sterile land which was once fruitful, and drainage restores its fertility.

Mr. CLAY. I think this amendment is intended for the purpose of draining swamp lands.

Mr. WARREN. It is intended and used for both.

Mr. CLAY. I think it is clearly intended to apply to swamp lands in the different States. I must confess——

Mr. DOLLIVER. There are undrained areas in lands which have been subjected to irrigation for many years. The irrigation projects around the city of Fresno, in California, for instance, have developed in the lower levels as definite swamps as you can find in Louisiana or in the wet portions of the United States. But my impression is that most of the work of the departments is engineering work, advisory in character, by which people who are confronted with the problem of removing water from lands are given some counsel as to how it can be efficiently done. I know that about the only thing they have done in Iowa is to give good advice.

Mr. CLAY. I presume they are trying to teach the people how to drain their lands by the publication of bulletins, and so forth. They may have the right to do that.

Mr. GALLINGER. And on that point I do not think the old farmer can be taught much. The fact is this is a great scheme, and it is going to involve the Government in millions upon millions of dollars if it is carried out. There is no question about that. There are in this country great areas of overflowed lands which it is proposed the Government shall drain. Now, if the Government is going into that business I wish it would come into New Hampshire and take the rocks from our farms. We would appreciate that very much.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I am interested in the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire about taking off the rocks in New Hampshire. I am reminded of the fact that the Senator told me they had to bury the rocks in New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. They do so, sometimes; but if the Government would do that we would be gratified.

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would save the farmer the expense of doing it.

Mr. BACON. One would be quite as effective as the other.

Mr. GALLINGER. It may be that it is the function of the Government to do all these things; it may be that it is the function of the Government to go into irrigation and then, if where they are irrigating their lands they make swamps, in place of using the money for irrigation to come here and ask the Government to drain the swamps. That may be proper, but it occurs to me that it is entering upon a field of expenditure that will result—the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] says to me it will swamp the Government, and I think he is pretty nearly right about it—in making it impossible for the Senators who are evolving this grand scheme of saving two or three hundred million dollars a year out of our present expenditures to accomplish anything in that direction.

But my purpose has been served by making the inquiry. I really can not quite understand why this great department should have had seven or eight appropriations of seventy or eighty thousand dollars each, or perhaps a less amount in some years, to carry on this investigation and has not completed it, and we have not any report and do not know how much has been done.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I simply desire to state to the Senator, in reference to his suggestion about using irrigation funds for drainage, that in most of the government works, if in not all of them, that are being undertaken now, I think they do include the drainage proposition.

I desire to say to the Senator that in my own locality some of this fund has been used, and been used very effectively, for this purpose. It may be very easy for the farmer in the East to understand how to drain his land. But there does seem to be considerable difficulty about draining lands where they have become swamp from irrigation. I know in one locality near my town a great deal of land had been destroyed by subirrigation, and it seemed to be very difficult to get the land drained. A representative of the Agricultural Department investigated the matter and prepared plans, and those plans were carried out by the farmers with very great success. Not a dollar of government money was spent in the construction of the work, but simply the plans were prepared by the department and were carried out by the farmers. I know there is another locality there now which seems to be very different from the locality already drained. The same method does not seem to be adapted to it. The Department of Agriculture hopes to be able to prepare plans for it by which a great many hundreds of acres will be drained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I suggested, my purpose has been served by raising the inquiry. At some future time I will look into this a little more carefully, and, perhaps, be prepared to debate it with more intelligence than I can command to-day. It struck me as being a project so enormous in its possibilities that we might well pause and at least make investigation of the matter ourselves and have some report. I will ask the Senator if up to the present time any report has been made as to the work?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Oh, yes. Every dollar expended is reported in this book of expenditure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know; but——

Mr. DOLLIVER. And I will add, for the encouragement of the Senator from New Hampshire, that this appropriation seems to be diminishing very rapidly.

The appropriation for 1909 seems to be, according to this report of expenditures, $150,000; for 1910, $80,000. I think that it is not a scheme calculated to involve the Treasury; it is simply an earnest effort to give the people interested expert advice in matters very essential to the reclaiming of lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator figured out what the aggregate expenditures up to the present time have been?

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; that would require more books than I have at hand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the report the Senator says has been made give us information as to where these investigations have been carried on?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Every dollar of it and everything.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not in dollars, I mean, but according to areas?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Oh, yes; the country seems to be divided into areas, and a small sum, but a sum satisfactory to each division, is assigned for the work in various parts of the country, including, I think, New England.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have some swamps in New England. I do not want to have New England overlooked, if the work is to be engaged in. I will be very glad to look at that report. I have not had access to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, my remarks are directed especially to this proposed amendment. I supposed when I first noticed the amendment in the bill that it was to perform a very necessary work, providing for the construction of a drainage system with the irrigation system, and exclusively for that purpose.

One of the first great mistakes that was made in carrying out the reclamation scheme was that they did not provide for drainage. We have to-day in actual existence large areas of land that have become sour, useless, and there is no arrangement by which they can be drained, because the undertaking is far beyond the possibility of individual enterprise. Drains are just as necessary to take water off the land as are the canals to take it on. You want only so much water, and you want it only for a certain length of time on land. At certain times when the water is flowing down these great canals it overdoes its work.

I heard a complaint made to the Secretary of the Interior on the occasion of his visit to the largest of these projects. I was with him at the time. More than one man rose and complained. They said, "Our neighbors, by irrigating their land, have destroyed our land. They have put the water upon their land, which lies on the slope above us, and there being no provision for draining off the surplus water our land has become sour and will not raise crops." The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Garfield, at that time, promised them to investigate the matter and see what relief could be afforded. I merely cite that instance because it is true in thousands of cases and will be increasingly true as time goes on.

The land after a few years needs very much less water than it does when the water is first placed upon the land. That is obvious. Anyone who has observed the matter at all knows that in many sections where irrigation was absolutely necessary for a great number of years they need to irrigate very little, and in many places none at all. I have in mind sections of the country large in extent where they have irrigated for years, but a silt forms from the water flowing over the land and creates a sort of false bed rock, as we call it; it creates a new condition of soil, so that the water is retained near the surface. That is building itself up year after year. No enterprise can be successfully applied or carried out that does not carry with it a drainage system. A flow of water over a great area of land, we will say 100,000 acres of land, will be upon a little higher plane than the next 100,000 acres below it. When the upper 100,000 acres of land have taken up and absorbed all that the land will absorb, the water necessarily goes down on the land below. That land had already been provided by a lateral of its own upon its own level with sufficient water to irrigate the land on that second level. So on, repeatedly, when the surface water comes down from the level above it overflows the lower land and destroys it. Land in the spring season is cold, what we call sour, and the crop dies; it produces no crop.

Had the scheme for bringing the water on the land been carried out as it should it would have included this drainage. This item should stay in the bill, but it should be amended by inserting, in line 7, page 62, after the word "lands," the words "when such conditions are caused by, or in consequence of national irrigation work." That would diminish the element of doubt which the Senator from New Hampshire has raised, as to what the purpose of the amendment was.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would not remove the appropriation, however.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not remove the appropriation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I have the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to make one observation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will resume the floor after the Senator gets through, because I have not finished the consideration of this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate long, as I never detain the Senate long. The Senator from Idaho has given me a text for a single observation. We legislated, and I was very glad to participate in that by giving my vote and my voice, in behalf of a grand irrigation scheme, which I think is a very beneficent thing for the country. But now it appears that when we have been irrigating the land we have been destroying other lands that bring a necessity for a still further appropriation.

It reminds me of another matter. We have spent millions of dollars in building levees on certain rivers in the country. The money was taken out of the Treasury of the United States ostensibly for the benefit of commerce, but to a large extent for the benefit of private ownership. Now we have filed in the proper department of the Government claims aggregating a great many millions of dollars for damage to lands resulting from the dikes that the Government built with the people's money. It is a rather extraordinary fact, but it is a fact. While I do not think they will ever win their cases in court, yet those claims are to be submitted, and are submitted, for consideration and adjudication.

So, in this scheme I am surprised to learn the fact—I did not know it before—that when we have been putting water on the lands, beneficent work, as I have suggested, we have been destroying adjacent lands, and we must now proceed to drain those lands to get rid of the sour conditions that the water has brought about. It may be wise legislation. I think it is better than going into the magnificent scheme, which is perhaps not involved in this appropriation bill, of entering into the States that have too much water and draining that off so as to make the land tillable. It is a scheme so large in its possibilities that it rather shocks me as an economist. I want to try to keep the revenues of the Government down if I can.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I care to say on that particular point. After the Senator from Idaho and others have discussed the question, I have a question to ask about one or two other items in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this item under existing circumstances should go out of the bill entirely, because the reclamation act provides the fund out of which this class of expenditure should be made. Clearly the proper construction of ditches for the purpose of irrigating a tract of land in the aggregate should include the carrying off the surplus water as well as the bringing on of the necessary water. I would not be willing to support an amendment of that kind unless it was necessary for the purpose of carrying out the idea of so distributing the water as to make it useful to the land and in no event destructive of it. As I said, there is already a fund provided out of which that class of drainage may be done. It is an absolutely necessary part of the bringing on and the use of the water that you shall take away the surplus water so that it will not damage the neighbor.

Now, that is a plain proposition, and that being already provided for, this item should go out of the bill, unless it is intended, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, to open up a new field of governmental enterprise with unknown possibilities.

If we are going to have a bill to provide for the drainage of lands pure and simple—that is, independent of reclamation, which is a very large project—it ought not to be considered in the very limited period that we can give to a measure of that kind on an appropriation bill. I have had a great many pathetic letters from different parts of the United States urging me to take up the question of including the drainage of their lands, but the trouble is, it would have to be done out of the Treasury of the United States, because the proceeds of the sales of the public lands are already devoted to another purpose, and the money does not come out of the Treasury of the United States.

The reclamation system amounts to making one hand wash the other. We make the land that needs no irrigation provide for the irrigation of that which does. We sell the land upon which irrigation is not needed and use the proceeds to make other lands equally salable. As a business proposition that would appeal to almost anybody. We have already provided for a complete disposition of that fund. If this amendment contemplates that we are going to enter upon an appropriation out of the general funds in the Treasury of the United States, as distinguished from the system under the reclamation act, it is a very serious question. There is no limit to the amount of money that might be needed, and it counts against every succeeding Congress in the amount of our appropriation bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, the expenditure of this fund last year is set forth in detail in the report of the Secretary in relation to the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture, which is before us. A detailed statement of the projects on which this fund has been expended, including the States and the various enterprises within each of them, is contained in the department's report of expenditures, so that the Senate may have a very accurate idea of what is intended by this appropriation.

I think it is probably one of the wisest and most economical expenditures of money that we have. It seems to be applied in very small amounts, but in practically all the States. I notice a slight discrimination against the State of Iowa, which appears to get of this fund only $400. I know that that came to us in the form of advice from engineers, and in no other form. The State of Idaho seems to be more highly favored, having received $2,558.54 of this money.

This report also shows exactly the kind of projects and the experiments to which the department is directing the attention of these experts. I think upon a careful examination it will be found that the money is expended very largely and economically throughout the country upon the request of communities that have problems which they can not solve, and that few general appropriations of the Department of Agriculture are more practical and efficient for the public service than this very appropriation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa as to the character of the service for which $2,500 were paid out and charged against the State of Idaho. What did the man do?

Mr. DOLLIVER. This book says that the State of Idaho received $2,258.54, charged to the—studies of methods of bringing new land into cultivation, and the quantity of water required by such land; determination of the effect of using different quantities of water applied by different methods; relation of the quantities of water and time of application to yield and quantity of crop.

Of the appropriation for the current fiscal year the State of Idaho receives $7,500 of this money, charged to—studies of methods of bringing new land under cultivation and quantities of water required; determination of the effect of using different quantities of water applied by different methods; determination of best methods of preparing land for irrigation and applying water to crops; experiments to determine extent of evaporation losses and effectiveness of methods of preventing them.

In the estimate of expenditures for this year in which this item is included the State of Idaho seems to have $4,000 for practically the same purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. The way the Senator speaks it would look as though that money was paid into the Treasury of the State of Idaho. Does the Senator understand that to be the case?

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; I do not so understand it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where is the money paid then?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is paid to people who are sent out there to study these questions, and who are studying them, as you can see, because the appropriation when spread out over the whole country is very small to each neighborhood. I have in mind a county in my own State which I think probably got this $400, a county which is very flat.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the county treasury get the money?

Mr. DOLLIVER. No; the man came out there and spent two months.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then you got the services of a man?

Mr. DOLLIVER. We got the services of a man, which was worth a great deal to our people in a single county, because he prepared a scheme of removing water from a very flat piece of land when all our homemade schemes of drainage, even though conducted by old farmers, had fallen very far short of getting rid of this water. The land had become practically unmanageable, and by that slight expense a scheme of drainage involving a great area was suggested by the department. Then the county was divided into drainage districts and the drainage carried on at the expense of the people who lived there; and by that slight expenditure——

Mr. HEYBURN. For advice?

Mr. DOLLIVER. For advice and engineering suggestions, the Government of the United States, without much loss of money, rendered to the community an almost incalculable service.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is just possible that that community would have been able to employ competent engineers, hydraulic or otherwise, to obtain the information that they say they received from the Government.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Curiously enough, that is not possible in that section of the country; and strange as it may sound, even our old farmers do not seem to know how to drain lands. Millions of dollars have been wasted in Iowa by homemade drainage schemes. The outlet was too small or the area covered by the districts was too great; and we have now fallen back with a great deal of confidence on the advice of those who know about it. We are conducting the drainage at our own expense. There is nothing involved in this that would call on the United States to drain any of this land, although there are regions of the United States which seem to me to have as much claim of getting water off the land at the expense of the Government, or at least with the cooperation of the Government, as other good sections have in the scheme of putting water on. On the whole, it is easier to get it off than it is to get it on.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not quite sure that the Senator is entirely right. The getting of water off the land without any fall is one of the most difficult of all problems, and it is a very important one. It astonishes me to learn that the Government has been, out of the General Treasury, furnishing skilled men or educated men to advise people as to the management of their private property. I am rather liberal in my views in regard to what the Government may do and should do, but this is a direct appropriation out of the Treasury for the purpose of employing men to advise the people of the States how they may get rid of surplus water. It is rather a singular proposition——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Government has spent nearly a million dollars up to the present time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is spending nearly a million dollars for advice. Now, it appears that they are talking about spending $4,000 for educating interested people in Idaho out of the Public Treasury of the United States. They do not dig any ditches; they do not set any surveyors' stakes; they do nothing but advise. Advice is the least expense of all commodities in this world, and probably it is the best stocked market of the world.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. The people generally prefer to select their advisers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for a question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether this entire appropriation bill, consisting of about $12,000,000, is not for service of the kind which he is now criticising? Do not all the items relate to matters of chemistry, plant industry, the investigation of the diseases of animals, and things of that kind, which are intended to help along the agriculturists of the country? Does not the Senator's criticism apply to the entire bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me answer that question before another one comes.

Mr. President, the appropriation in a large measure is for advice, but not to individuals; not to personal interests. It is for the determination of questions that are applicable to all the subjects and not for the purpose of enabling some man to make his land more valuable. The agricultural appropriation bill, of course, is comparatively new. Nearly one-half of it here is devoted to one particular subject, to which I shall call the attention of the Senate when that subject is reached. But this is so personal that it seems to antagonize my sense of right and duty. In the reclamation project we only borrow the money with a sufficient guaranty for its repayment, but in this case we appropriate it out of the public moneys of the United States at the expense of other necessary governmental purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Sentor from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. In just a moment I will yield the floor. We apply it solely to the advantage of a single individual in order that he may benefit by it. It does not seem to me that it is within the province of the Government to do it out of the Public Treasury. The Government may accommodate its means one to another; it may take lands that are not arid, and it may convert the arid lands into the same class; but to take money out of the Public Treasury to pay men to advise somebody, I do not care whether it is in Idaho or in Alaska or where it is, is not a function of government. It reminds me too much of—

Who ran to catch me when I fell
And kissed the place to make it well?

That kind of government does not appeal to me.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the losses to the people of the United States from the overflow of surface waters have been perfectly enormous. This appropriation, which provides for the Government to investigate and report, to prepare plans, to prepare and illustrate reports and bulletins on drainage, has been very useful indeed. The Agricultural Department has in fact become a department for the distribution of information dealing with the question of soils, with the question of the productive power of soils, how to make them more productive by adding water, how to make them more productive by drainage processes; and the issuance of these bulletins to the various States of the Union can be more judiciously done through the General Government than in any other way. I think it is entirely justified, too.

I think the amount appropriated compared to the value of this information is trivial. The importance of this subject can hardly be exaggerated. I recall an instance in which the department made a survey on Little Caney River in southern Kansas, a stream which had been overflowing. They continued that survey down Little Caney River into Oklahoma. A private individual could not very well do that.

It was an interstate project, the river rising in Kansas and flooding the valleys and running over into Oklahoma. The Government at a very low cost made a survey, showing that the land could be reclaimed by the expenditure, not by the Government but by the people who owned the land, at their own expense, when they were told how. The people propose to take advantage of that information given them by the General Government, and to establish drainage districts across that state line that will make effective and valuable a very large area of valley land which has heretofore been overflowed in a manner apparently hopeless. It will cost the Government nothing. The cost of the survey was a trivial matter. Yet it must be provided by some governmental function, because it is not in the hands of the individuals altogether, crossing as it does the state lines. At all events, it is in pursuance of the fixed policy of the Government in regard to these matters. It is no departure from the spirit of the agricultural appropriation bill.

I therefore think it my duty to express myself in favor of this amendment as being a wise and judicious expenditure on the part of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there has been no appropriation made by Congress that has done so much good for the State of Utah as the item under consideration in this appropriation bill. The Department of Agriculture has demonstrated beyond a question that the alkali lands of my State can be made as productive as any land in the State. They started years ago experimenting with the alkali lands, and proved they could be reclaimed, and lately with the water-logged land in Emery County and other counties of Utah, and has demonstrated beyond question that they can drain these lands and make lands profitable that have been absolutely useless in years past. This has been accomplished by draining the land and then washing the saleratus out of it. Some of the richest lands that we have in the State of Utah to-day have been made so by these experiments made by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if any part of the appropriation carried in this bill is needed by the Western States, it is this particular item that is under discussion at the present time. I certainly hope that it will be approved. I think it would be a very good thing indeed if it were increased, rather than decreased.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think the committee is entitled to the thanks of the Senate for having presented this amendment for its consideration. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] undertakes to raise a question with reference to the power of the Government. That question is quite sufficiently answered by the statement that the Government is a very large owner of swamp and overflowed lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not conceive how the Senator arrived at the conclusion that I question the power of the Government. I said nothing which would justify that conclusion. I was speaking only of the expediency of a direct appropriation out of the Treasury for the purpose.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Idaho waives the question of power. It might have been a question of conscience with the Senator.

Mr. President, the United States is, as I have alleged, the owner of a large acreage of swamp and overflowed lands; and for the purpose of ascertaining how to make those lands available and with the least possible expense and effort, this trifling appropriation is unquestionably, according to my view, a wise expenditure of public money; but while making its own property more valuable, the Government itself will procure information which will enable the farmers, with private holdings that are overflowed, to make their lands more valuable.

There has not been a time in the history of the country when the attention of the public has been so thoroughly aroused with reference to the production of the necessaries of life as at this present hour. It is well known that farm products are higher than they have been for a long time and, in some instances, higher in the public markets than ever before. Undoubtedly, if a large surplus existed, this high standard would not obtain.

It is a matter of sound public policy, according to my view, for the Government to encourage settlement upon the public domain, and, to that end, to reclaim the arid portions of the public domain as rapidly as possible. On the other hand, we have these swamp and overflowed lands, highly productive when drained, utterly useless in their present state. The people of the respective States can only proceed in a piecemeal fashion to deal with a question like this. The condition is nation wide; it is continental. There are swamp and overflowed lands within the limits of every State and Territory in this Union. In some instances, as suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, these swamp lands extend across State lines, and under conditions where the subject can not be sufficiently dealt with without crossing the state line. If, for the sum of $78,000 or $780,000, a fund of information can be procured with reference to the proper treatment of these lands looking to reclamation, the investment will be paid back 10,000 fold in the reclamation of the lands in question.

Why, Mr. President, the Kingdom of Holland, the most productive in the world of like area, is but a swamp. When the Duke of Alva and his strong hosts went up there from the peninsula to subdue those good people, the Dutch had to go out and cut the dikes. While submerging their own homes, they exterminated the Spanish army, and with the incoming water drove the invaders from their homes. They pumped that water out again and rebuilt the dikes; and from that time to this those patient people with their picturesque wind pumps have been draining those lands, which have yielded bountiful crops, as we know so well.

Mr. President, I do not know but that the water flowing down from the mountains may be utilized to generate electric power that may be used in an economical fashion to drain the lowlands, of which the Senator from Idaho speaks, where the lands are so flat that drainage by gravity is quite out of the question. If that can be done successfully, it is well that we should be advised of the fact. I am sure that the American people, mindful of the value of their own property, enterprising as they are, will address themselves with vigor and earnestness to the reclamation of these lands if a feasible way is pointed out. This item contemplates pointing out that way. I think it is a very excellent piece of legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, my attention was first called to this matter some years ago, when a Senator, not now a member of this body, introduced a bill to divert $1,000,000 from the irrigation fund to the drainage of swamp lands in his State. The proposition did not become a law, but the purpose of that Senator was apparent, and from that day to this the agitation has been going on.

This does not say that we will drain the Government's lands. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] says the Government has a good deal of that kind of land. The provision does not say that. If it said that, I would not object to it at all. I am not very seriously objecting to it now, only I want to get information. The purpose is not one that can be tossed aside foolishly. I know how Senators always eloquently appeal for these appropriations, because they are going to do a great public good; but when we undertake the process of draining these swamp lands of the United States, after the Secretary of Agriculture, expending perhaps two or three million dollars in an investigation, tells us it can be done, then a bill is presented here, and the friends of irrigation, of course, will vote for it and the friends of river and harbor appropriations will vote for it, and it will go through. We shall then have another great scheme of expenditure on our hands that will be somewhat more serious than it appears to-day.

Now, Mr. President, for the purpose of getting definite information on this subject, I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], in charge of the bill, if he objects to these words being added to the Senate amendment:

> And the Secretary of Agriculture shall make a special report to the next session of Congress, giving in detail the aggregate expenditures under this provision and the areas in the several States and Territories which have been investigated.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I should have no objection to that amendment but for the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is already, under his legal duty, bound to make a detailed report of that exact matter, and he has done it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment provides for "a special report" to Congress, so that we shall have the report on our desks. We can not all have that great book which the Senator has.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is the benevolent purpose of the Senate to give each Senator a copy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to add to the committee amendment the words which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 12, after the word "dollars," in the amendment already agreed to, it is proposed to insert:

And the Secretary of Agriculture shall make a special report to the next session of Congress, giving in detail the aggregate expenditures under this provision and the areas in the several States and Territories which have been investigated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to modify the amendment by striking out the words "in detail," so as to read "giving the aggregate expenditures."

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I do not see any reason why we should not have such a report. I myself should be very glad to get it, and should be disappointed if I did not get it without his amendment.

On the question, however, of the Senate committee amendment to the bill, I want to say that it is not the purpose of the amendment that the United States shall undertake the charitable work of draining the swamp lands for any private citizen or even for itself—outside, I mean, of the reclamation and irrigation projects. In that case, of course, the United States must take care of its own lands after irrigating them, and make them and the lands of those citizens that shall lie under the operations of the system of irrigation ready for sale. The expenditure is to be refunded, as has been repeatedly explained, in the next seven years. There has been no doubt expressed about the fact that the money will all be returned and that the United States will largely be the beneficiary of the improvement in its land system.

In irrigation it necessarily follows that there are surplus waters which flow down into those hollows and receptacles natural to that part of the country, which most of us know something about—that form morasses and lakes that should be drained. Those lands are not generally the lands of private individuals, but are the lands of the United States. But whether they are or not, as the United States has put the water on them it might undertake to take it off.

I am, however, not particularly concerned in that work, except that I favor the irrigation and reclamation project as a whole. I leave the details for those Senators who live in that country and who are more particularly acquainted with the wants of the country; but now the question is as to this appropriation, which is a small one, for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the scientific methods of draining swamp and overflowed lands. When this question was first agitated it was for the purpose of investigating the engineering possibilities of draining lands on the seacoast of the Southern States particularly, but applying anywhere within the United States. Those lands, extremely productive if cleared of water, were so near the tide level that no farmer with a small holding would ever be able to bring to the task the scientific inquiry and work necessary to do it. As the United States has, whether wisely or not—and I think very wisely—undertaken to teach the people some things and are quite revolutionizing the methods of farming in my own section of the country, I think it is well enough they should furnish us some information upon this particular subject.

It is not intended that the United States shall pay for the drainage of anybody's land, any more than it is intended, when you send Doctor Knapp and his corps of assistant instructors through the country to teach the farmers how to plow, how to rotate crops, the value of fertilizers, the analyses of soils, and so forth, that the United States shall plow and cultivate land for the farmer. It is only intended to give instruction. I think instruction has been given in a manner and to an effect that is enormously productive of good to the people of this country. In my opinion it has worked a revolution in my State. This morning I had a letter from a prominent planter in the Delta, who works 20 plantations, and under Doctor Knapp's supervision he is planting a large quantity of land in rice. The land was not irrigated, and yet he cleared out of that crop $74.50 an acre, where he did not know he could grow rice without water upon it.

We are also concentrating in cultivation; we are adopting the intensive method of cultivation. We are discovering that we can make as much corn in Mississippi as you can make in Iowa or in Illinois or anywhere else. I may mention, for the information of Senators, that the boys in my State have formed what are called "corn clubs." The movement began in Holmes County, the county of my birth. In the last crop the average yield of the boys' clubs, numbering 250 odd in my State, was 70 bushels per acre. The boy who took the prize raised 139 bushels per acre; and all this was accomplished under the instruction of the Department of Agriculture. They had been going on in a way that you might call "slipshod" down there. I suppose the same thing holds good anywhere in this Union. Here is an adventurous gentleman named Campbell, who taught in the dry country in the panhandle of Texas what is called "dry farming." That has been taken up by farmers in that arid region, and it is found that great crops of wheat can be raised without any irrigation at all.

This work of benefiting the farmer by instruction extends just as well to teaching him how to drain his unprofitable coast land and swamp land as it does to teaching him how to cultivate his dry land or irrigated land or land that needs neither irrigation nor drainage. That instruction is going on with such universal success and with such universal benefit, that we ought not to stick at this small proposition, which does not propose charitable aid to anybody in draining his land, but simply to teach him the way to do it, and leave it to him to do it by himself.

I am perfectly willing to admit that the State should undertake to do this work. I can not understand why the State does not do it; but the States have not done it, and when this department is exercising its undoubted function under the control and direction of Congress, and we appropriate just as much money as we think is necessary, then it is, in my opinion, a rather backward step to oppose a small appropriation like this, which will so abundantly repay the country for the investment.

I recollect, Mr. President, once, many years ago, when I went to see the Chief of the Corps of Engineers, General Wright, about some small river improvement in the river and harbor bill, which was very much objected to by some who lived principally in New York City, who wanted the rivers stopped up and the railroads built up, so as to bring all the traffic to their own port. All the great metropolitan newspapers were making fun of the small rivers, but General Wright said:

The money the Government is spending on the small unknown streams that are being opened up for navigation, to feed the other streams and railroads, is the most profitable investment this country has ever made.

It is true, Mr. President, that the agricultural bill is increasing in size every year, but I have yet to see where a sum has been improvidently expended or appropriated. I remarked to Secretary Wilson the other day, when he was before the committee, that in my long experience with him as the Secretary of Agriculture, and being all the time on the Committee on Agriculture, the only fault I had ever found with him was that he was too stingy with his money; that he never asked for enough. He would not have had a new department building if it had been left to him; he would not have had a laboratory building if it had been left to him, because he disliked, he said, to tax the generosity of Congress.

He has never misappropriated or misspent a dollar that has come within his supervision. That there has been extravagance in some of the bureaus, I think, is susceptible of proof, and probably will be proven before we get through with the discussion of this bill; but certainly, when the money is brought under his supervision, it has been economically, wisely, and efficiently expended. I am not afraid to trust him so long as he remains at the head of that department or elsewhere.

The gentleman whom he has engaged, and who is teaching practically an improved system of intensive farming to the people of the country, is the man who succeeded him in the presidency of the Agricultural College of Iowa. Secretary Wilson summoned him here by letter to aid him in this work, and Doctor Knapp came here without knowing for what he was sent until he was sent upon this mission. I want to say that the leading paper in my State, in a long editorial, said that they could not understand how the Secretary of Agriculture could secure men of such talent that they could hold in the greatest interest all the farmers of the country, all the professional people—the doctors, the lawyers, the preachers, and others—at their meetings. Everybody goes to hear them, and the amount of good which has been done is great.

Most of these employees are doing missionary work. The compensation they get rarely pays their traveling expenses from place to place. They are doing their work con amore; they are enthusiastic about it; they are doing good; and the satisfaction of its being well done is a sufficient compensation, I am glad to say, for a great many of them, even in this degenerate day. I hope that no serious opposition will be made to this item.

Admitting all that may be said, I am not one to commit this Government to the system of paternalism. I have no slight tendency toward socialism or paternalism. I may be called a strict constructionist of the Constitution; and I shall always insist upon it as a safeguard of our liberty to secure the permanency and honesty of our free institutions; but that view can not be invoked in this matter, in my humble opinion.

I yield to the good and better judgment of the lawyers on this floor who may oppose this measure; but I think they will find, when they take this bill as a whole, that it has been framed with careful regard to the best interests of the whole country and to the economical expenditure of the money that is appropriated. I have found, Mr. President, in my experience that a liberal appropriation and an economical expenditure are the two things necessary for improved civil administration. I hope that this bill will go through as it has been presented to the Senate. Of course if any Senator has an amendment which, in his judgment, is good, I think the committee will be very glad to accept it. We do not believe that all the knowledge of agriculture and forestry is concentered in that committee, and I think the honorable chairman, who has charge of the bill, will be glad to receive a suggestion from any Senator that will tend to improve it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, this appropriation has been abundantly justified by the results that have uniformly followed it. The State of Arkansas has been one of the chief beneficiaries of this system, and because the experience there has been such as to show that it is a proper appropriation, I feel I ought to say a word or two on the subject.

No one assails it on the ground of its policy, but some do on the ground that it opens up an avenue of public expenditure not appropriate for the United States to assume. The matter of draining overflowed lands is technical in its character. Theoretical systems of drainage have been resorted to by such engineering force as is locally available, and, as often as otherwise, they have proven to be a failure, whereas this particular bureau maintained in the Agricultural Department has drawn around it some of the best skill that can be obtained in that line of human endeavor.

By bringing into relation a great number of projects they have been enabled to evolve, in connection with the scientific and theoretical features of it, a practical application that has vastly heightened its utility. They have, therefore, been able to master many problems that proved to be failures when left to the local engineers, who have nothing but the ordinary technical training that comes from a college course in that behalf, and who are deprived of that wide field of observation that is necessary to clarify and make plain the principles of that particular branch of the public service.

We have reclaimed in the State of Arkansas a vast area of land that was supposed to be utterly useless. It was done under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, and now constitutes one of the most productive and profitable rice fields to be found in this country. We are now engaged in examining the so-called "hopelessly abandoned lands" in the sunken-land region of the State of Arkansas, known as the "St. Francis Basin," made so by the construction of the levees of the Mississippi River. It has been found that much of those lands can be reclaimed and subjected to the uses of the agricultural element of the people and at the same time render vast benefit to navigation in that vicinity.

The practical value of the assistance that the Government has furnished has been so completely demonstrated that from that standpoint no criticism can be made.

From the legal aspect it is along that same line that, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has suggested, the whole bill is carried. There is not a word that can be said in favor of a single provision in it that can not be amplified and emphasized in behalf of this particular item. It has been tried heretofore, and very successfully tried, and has justified the reasons that prompted its introduction into this bill.

Because Arkansas affords one of the most promising fields in which its utility has been demonstrated, it occurred to me that it would not be inappropriate to call attention to the fact that there is work yet there to be done in this connection; and if it be done as well as that which has heretofore been done, it will again prove the utility of this new item of concern that the United States Government has taken upon itself.

I am perfectly apprised of the fact that the States could undertake this work, and I am perfectly apprised of the fact that the chief beneficiaries of it will be private landowners, but, in an incidental way, as the benefits flow out and distribute themselves among all the people, they will be manifest in better conditions, in the promotion of which everybody ought to be engaged and for the promotion of which all governments are organized.

I see no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], because if the results attained are satisfactory, are wholesome, then everybody ought to know it and the widest publicity should be given. I trust that the chairman of the committee will, if consistent with his idea of the manner in which he shall conduct this bill, accept that amendment without further delay.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if this item can be objected to, either upon the ground of lack of constitutional power or upon the ground of expediency, then every item in this bill is subject to the same objection in higher degree, for it is a bill that relates entirely to scientific investigation and inquiry. It takes hold of plant life and animal life, the qualities of the soil, the study of moisture in its relation to cultivation, and authorizes these inquiries and investigations, with a view to advancing the scientific information and knowledge of the country upon these subjects. We do not find in the Constitution any express power covering these inquiries; certainly none of the granted powers cover them; and unless you can claim that they belong inherently to sovereignty you will perhaps find no justification whatever for the other items of this bill. But, comparatively, I can say that you will find more justification for this particular item than you can for any other item.

The study of drainage will come up, so far as the Government is concerned, in connection with the ownership of government lands, which may be or are subject to overflow and which it doubtless as a proprietor has the power to improve, and also with reference to the navigable rivers over which the Nation has jurisdiction under the interstate clause of the Constitution, in so far as navigation is concerned. We find many questions related to navigation, and no plan can be formed for the promotion of navigation that does not involve an inquiry into irrigation, an inquiry into swamp-land reclamation, an inquiry into the development of water power, an inquiry into the protection of the banks of rivers as part of the plans which will result in their improvement for navigation, or, at all events, in diminishing the cost of execution.

Now, outside of the actual ownership of the Government in swamp lands, we have vast areas of land on the lower reaches of all of the rivers in this country—those on the Pacific coast; those in the Mississippi Valley, including the tributaries of the Mississippi and the Missouri; those on the Gulf coast; and those on the Atlantic coast.

On the Atlantic coast we have a continuation of sounds and bays formed largely by the deposition of alluvial soils near the shores, and any study of the inland waterways of the Atlantic coast should include a study of reclamation in connection with the coastal canal as contemplated for the purpose of securing a protected waterway all the way from Boston to Florida. We all know how extensive are the swamp and overflowed lands of the Mississippi Valley, their extraordinary richness and fertility. We know that no scientific plan can be developed for the treatment of the Mississippi River and its tributaries as a great instrumentality of interstate and foreign commerce without taking into consideration as a matter both of constructive plan and of economy the reclamation of these swamp and overflowed areas.

This item provides simply for investigation, an investigation which I hope will lead ultimately to scientific plans which will take up the whole question of the development of our waterways from the scientific standpoint, involving their development for every civilized use, not simply for navigation, but for irrigation, for water power, for swamp-land reclamation, and other uses, and which will involve not only the action of the National Government in large expenditures in carrying out these plans, but the cooperation of the States and municipalities and corporations and individuals, each acting under a scientific plan formed with the cooperation of all, each acting in cooperation with the other, each acting within the lines of its jurisdiction and its power and its rights and its interests, and all in the development of a great and scientific plan.

It seems to me that in the ultimate development of the inland waterways of the country, as an instrumentality of transportation, the study of waterway transportation in coordination and cooperation with railway transportation, this subject is of vital importance. So I distinguish it from the other items in the bill as one absolutely coming within the granted powers of the Constitution and not amenable to any objection as to constitutional power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, lest it might be said that I was opposing this measure because its benefits would fall upon certain sections of the country and not upon others, I desire to say that I am not opposing this measure in the sense of opposition. As it was presented in the bill it was rather ambiguous to many, as it seems from the discussion of it.

Mr. KEAN. Has the text been changed? It has not been amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Several amendments have been suggested. Some have been suggested and withdrawn. I say the meaning of the section is vested with some uncertainty as to the purpose and intent. Some Senators have assumed and spoken from the standpoint that this was an appropriation for the purpose of further protecting lands over which the Government already has some supervisory power, but it has developed that it is the utlimate intention of this appropriation that it be extended so as to comprehend vast swamp lands in the country.

I thoroughly agree with the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that this whole bill is rather along educational lines, and that almost all that the Agricultural Department does is in the way of experiments and the giving out to the people of the results of the experiments. I certainly have no objection to that principle or the practice. I think it is a good one, and is justified. It is only a question of how far we go.

The Senator from Montana undertook to place me in the position of objecting to the proposition upon constitutional grounds. I suggested nothing of the kind. It is a question whether or not we are going to enter upon this class of expenditure. I doubt not that some sections of the country which, should the Government engage in this class of enterprise, would be very much benefited, would be in favor of it. That is reasonable. Each person representing a section of the country in this or any other representative body naturally has in his mind as a text the conditions that exist in that section of the country. I have no objection whatever to this comparatively small appropriation along educational lines, but I did what every man should do here: I entered upon an inquiry as to the present and the ultimate purpose of the measure under consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let the question be taken on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. To the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire the committee will offer no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to have it stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, after the word "dollars," in line 12, insert:

> And the Secretary of Agriculture shall make a special report to the next session of Congress giving the aggregate expenditure under this provision and the areas in the several States and Territories which have been investigated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise for information. What is the question that is being submitted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am of an inquiring turn of mind this morning, and I want to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa, in charge of the bill, concerning another item. I will ask the Senator if he can tell me what were the receipts last year from the forest reserves of this country; from the sale of timber, and other items?

Mr. DOLLIVER. My impression is that they were in the neighborhood of $1,800,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I want to inquire about is the amendment on page 41, which reads:

> That hereafter 35 per cent of all money received from each forest reserve during any fiscal year, including the year ending June 30, 1910, shall be paid at the end thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State or Territory in which said reserve is situated, to be expended as the state or territorial legislature may prescribe for the benefit of the public schools and public roads of the county or counties in which the forest reserve is situated: Provided, That when any forest reserve is in more than one State or Territory or county the distributive share to each from the proceeds of said reserve shall be proportional to its area therein.

I am not going to make any factious opposition to the item at all, but what attracts my attention is that these forest reserves belong to the Nation. Even the little States of the North have an interest in them equal to those of any other State. It is national property, governmental property, and there is an income derived from them which doubtless will increase from year to year, and I should like to ask upon what hypothesis, upon what principle of justice, are we going to divert 35 per cent of the income from those forest reserves to the States in which they are situated to be used for schools or for any other purpose? There may be some good reason for it, but it does not occur to me offhand. Very likely the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Idaho can explain it. If it is 35 per cent this year, it may be 50 per cent next year, or 75 per cent the following year.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If it will not inconvenience the Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to have that discussion arise when the portion of the bill relating to forestry matters is taken up.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I will let it stop right here.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I notice a large number of eager Senators who seem to be able to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. GALLINGER. One other interrogatory and I am through. I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he himself or his committee, and I presume I have no right to ask what the committee did, took into consideration the propriety of increasing the appropriation for roads above what the House allowed? That is an important matter which is attracting the attention of the people in my section of the country to a very large extent.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say, in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, that the committee did very seriously consider that question. Every member of the committee appreciated the importance of it, but each member found himself constrained, by the necessities that now surround us, to avoid, so far as possible, any expansion of expenditures; and we postponed the road business until next year, on the theory that we could manage in some way to get through this next season with the present roads.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for the suggestion that next year this matter will be given very careful consideration. I raised the question very largely for the reason that ex-Governor Bachelder, of my State, who was secretary of agriculture for New Hampshire and who is master of the National Grange, a very enterprising gentleman, a very potential man in matters of this kind, has written me a very strong letter urging that I should make an effort to get the appropriation increased. Of course I will not do that under the circumstances, but I will ask permission to have the letter of Governor Bachelder printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

> NATIONAL GRANGE, PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY,
> OFFICE OF MASTER,
> Concord, N. H., February 23, 1910.
> Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: As you are, of course, aware, the National Grange is deeply interested in the valuable work on behalf of public highway improvement carried on by the United States Office of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture. We believe that the services rendered by this bureau in advising the various local road authorities as to the best methods of road construction and the kind of roads best suited to each particular community are of the greatest importance to the farmers of the entire country and that this important work should be extended as widely as possible.
> The appropriation of $114,240 made by the House is wholly inadequate to provide for the extension of the bureau's activities in the many directions in which its cooperation is urgently needed, and I would therefore urge that you take action, when the House bill comes before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, to have the appropriation for this purpose increased to $214,000.
> It is a conservative estimate that of the $90,000,000 now expended annually for road improvement by the various local and country road boards one-half, or $45,000,000, is practically wasted through lack of knowledge on the part of the officials charged with administering the road laws. The greater part of this money could be saved by giving these local authorities the benefit of expert advice and assistance by the trained highway engineers of a properly equipped Office of Public Roads, and I am sure that if this phase of the matter is understood by Congress there will be no hesitation in granting the additional appropriation asked for.
> There is no other question in which the farmers of the country are so vitally interested as that of road improvement, and it seems to me that it would be a wise political move on the part of the leaders in Congress to show that they are willing to aid in furthering this most important work.
> Very sincerely, yours, N. J. BACHELDER.

Mr. CLAY. With permission of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, I desire to return to page 8, lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. I was not present when that feature of the bill was considered. After the word "dollars," in line 5, I move to insert:

> Of which sum $40,000 shall be immediately available.

It does not increase the appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. On page 60, line 13, after the word "dollars," where it first occurs, I desire to insert "$8,000 to be especially devoted to experiments relating to the culture of coffee."

This paragraph alludes to the appropriation for the Porto Rican experiment station, and I offer the amendment at the request of the Commissioner from Porto Rico, upon a showing that the coffee industry is an important one, being about one-half of the total agricultural interest of Porto Rico; and he desires that this experiment station, which we establish there, shall devote at least $8,000 of the $28,000 appropriated to experiments in relation to coffee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 13, on page 60, it is proposed to insert:

Eight thousand dollars to be especially devoted to experiments relating to the culture of coffee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That completes the bill so far as the committee is concerned, with the exception of the paragraph relating to forestry. On the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho that he does not feel able to proceed, as I am not feeling very well myself, I will be very glad to have it go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly, if the Senator from Iowa is not feeling any better than I am he would prefer to have it go over, but if it is the desire of the Senate to proceed I am able to go on. That is just the situation with me. I would not ask that it go over. I would merely acquiesce in the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. I am not going to occupy any very great length of time on the matter.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Very well. I think possibly we had better proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The item on page 23, commencing in line 21, subhead "Forest Service," is now under consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, throughout several sessions of Congress we have been accustomed to take up this item for very extended consideration, but there has come a change in the condition of affairs, which, in my judgment, calls for conservative, I might almost say delayed, consideration.

My objections to many features of the Forest Service have been directed against the manner of the execution of such laws as Congress has seen fit to pass. My objection has been directed to the application of the principle of government that where there was no law there was complete liberty. That condition I think no longer exists. The policies that have been substituted for law I believe will, in the execution of the law, give way.

Mr. President, I recall, six years ago, I think, in this body, when the appropriation for this item was very small and the area of forest reserves was small, that one of the most distinguished men who ever sat in this body, after listening to the discussion of the question for some time, rose and inquired how far we might expect this class of appropriation to go in the years that were to come; and he was given the assurance that it could not cost the Government any sum of money after the next Congress; that it would be self-sustaining; and, more than that, it would be one of the sources of income to the Government, out of which other expenses might be paid.

There were some—I among the number—who wanted some assurance as to the truth of the statement that this would be a contributing source out of which other branches of the Government might be maintained. The years have gone one after another, and we find that instead of this great enterprise, with a capital of 200,000,000 acres of land, being solvent it is insolvent to the extent that we are asked in this bill to make an appropriation of $5,703,700 to maintain this business enterprise.

We are given a promise of a credit, based upon experience, of $1,766,088, leaving this great business enterprise in which the Government is engaged insolvent in the figures $3,937,612. I say "insolvent" because we are called upon to make good that much loss in the administration of the estate which the Government claims in these lands. It can not be claimed for a moment that the Government is handicapped for want of capital to carry on this business. We gave them more than $4,000,000 in the last appropriation bill, more than $3,000,000 in the one preceding that, more than $1,000,000 in the one preceding that. So you see that the insolvency of the Government's enterprise is a growing one.

We were assured that upon figures which we could not mistake this enterprise would be just the reverse of what we find it upon the books of the Government. Where are those who stood sponsors for this enterprise in that day? Why are they not here to tell us either why they were mistaken or else to confess the error and say, "Let us reorganize this business." What is the purpose——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. Let me suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the business itself has increased. Very large tracts of land have been taken in, which makes it necessary to appropriate more money.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been dealing with the period since the tracts were taken in.

Mr. FLINT. Oh, no. Tracts have been taken in every year; even this year.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the figures here.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The tracts which have been taken in, according to the House report, aggregate 26,528,000 acres. One-half of that is in Alaska.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The additional appropriation asked for by the Forest Service because of that increase is, in round numbers, $400,000. It shows a peculiar aptitude for juggling with figures when for the 13,000,000 acres in Alaska which have been added, which should form one-half of the $400,000 increase, there is an increase of only $6,000 asked. Obviously the increased appropriation asked for in this bill for the 13,000,000 acres in the United States proper is at the rate of something like 30 cents an acre for the administration of the reserves added.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is not the reason to be given why the Government is not administering this estate profitably. Few things in this world improve through idleness. I happen to have the receipt of the treasurer of one of the counties in which this business enterprise is being carried on very largely, showing how much the Government contributes to the expenses of that jurisdiction. The county and state taxes—that is, the general taxes—paid in that county upon private property amount to $190,000. I have this from one of the county officers, the treasurer of the county. The taxes paid by private citizens amount to $190,000. The Government, through the provision in the last appropriation bill, contributes to the affairs of that county $765.87. The Government owns two-thirds of the property in that county, and the citizens who pay $190,000 toward its maintenance own one-third. That merely appeals to the equitable sense of the people.

The inquiry was made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] as to why the county should receive any part of it. In that county the men who are there to represent the Government receive, first, the benefit of the law that affects them in their personal and property rights. They receive, next, the benefit of the local law, the state law, that protects these forests from fire. The State of Idaho did thus, pursuant to the laws of the State of Idaho, expend $10 where the Government expends $1 in the protection of the Government's timber. Upon that vast area, and that reserve is nearly as large as some of the States of the United States, there is just as much and the same necessity for protection of the law administered at the expense of the State and counties as there is elsewhere. There are post-offices, villages, public schools, and other institutions of public benefit maintained upon the very forest reserves themselves. The people were there when the forest reserves came.

Would it be fair to have a nonresident landholder in the State exempted from contribution to the expenses of the State and the local government? Should the United States be exempt from contributing to the cost of its own protection and the protection of its own property? It is true that we can not tax their land: alas, it is true. I would not favor the taxation of the land of the United States, but I would favor a system of government by which the title to that land would be transferred to persons who would be taxpayers.

How does the United States benefit from the solitude they create in that vast area? It is not one of the largest, by any manner of means, in the State. Who benefits by it? I see here one of the papers in that immediate vicinity says:

What promises to be the biggest timber sale ever made from any forest reserve has practically been completed by the local forestry department. This deal aggregates about 250,000,000 feet of timber, all of which is located in the St. Joe River and Coeur d'Alene River watersheds. The purchasers consist of eight different companies, all of which are operating mills in the Coeur d'Alene Lake district.

The average price at which this timber will change hands will be very little less than $4 a thousand feet, so that the returns to the forestry department will be close to a million dollars. The price will depend to a large extent on the quality and accessibility of the timber, but even when all this has been allowed for it is believed that of the whole 250,000,000 feet involved only about 60,000,000 will be sold for less than that figure.

What becomes of the conservation of the water and the snow? Here we find the forests out there doing the things that we are told in this Chamber will result in the bringing about of arid conditions, because they say that the cutting off of the timber will prevent the snows from being retained and distributed in a proper and economical manner. That is only one of hundreds of cases like it that I could stand here and cite. I have a vast accumulation of figures here showing that the Government itself is selling the right to denude these lands of their timber, when the forest reserves were first created to preserve the timber. It was the declared purpose of the law when it was first enacted to preserve the timber. Now, we find that they have turned highwaymen and are doing the thing that they sought to prevent.

I do not attach so much importance to that, because I do not think that the retention of the timber upon the ground has a thing on earth to do with the retention of the snow. When I first made that statement here five years ago I doubt if there was a Senator on the floor who agreed with me, and I was regarded as being a crank upon that subject. I was cartooned and ridiculed from one end of the country to the other because I said that the cutting of the timber had nothing to do with the manner in which the snow went off, except if it did anything at all it made the snow go off earlier. Now, I am not alone, nor am I lonely in my position. I have the Chief of the Weather Bureau of the United States out in a pamphlet, which I have before me on the desk, in which he sustains just the position I took then and ever since, that the snow goes out of the timber first, and lastly it goes from the bare mountain peaks. I have lived thirty years among it, and I ought to know something about it. When the snow comes sifting down and lighting upon the limbs and twigs of the trees, it falls more lightly than it does when it comes without interruption, and it begins to melt up in the atmosphere, and melts from the limbs of the trees and honeycombs the snow around it. I have walked and camped and stayed under trees to avoid being out in the snow that surrounded them, and so has every other man who has had any experience in that kind of life. When it rains, as it does continually in these countries where the snow fall is heavy, the rain, dropping down from the trees tends to crystallize or honeycomb the snow, and it goes out. I have seen the flowers blooming under the trees when the snow had gone off and the balance of the country was covered with snow. So will anyone else see that condition who goes into the country where such things exist. However, I have been sustained by the executive department of the Government. So I think I will let that question rest. It is no longer open for argument.

Now, there is the question of contribution to the expenses of the Government. That I have already in a measure discussed. That we should have a nonresident landlord forced into our midst who is not content to administer his own estate, but wants to administer ours, ought to appeal to the sense of justice in any man.

We were just reminded by the distinguished occupant of the chair that this land belongs to all the States. Well, why do they not go and use them? There is only one thing you can do with land, and that is to use it and live on it. Why do they not go out there and perform their part of the contract? The land is there, it belongs to the Government, and they are citizens of the Government. Why do they not go out there? They can not bring it away. I suppose, if they could, they would compel us to send it to them.

Mr. President, as I have said before, I hope and pray that brighter skies and better conditions, a conservative sense and judgment and respect for the law are due. I trust that we will never again hear it said that if there is no law there is perfect license.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize this condition in Bonner County, because it is true in every other county in which the forest reserves are situated. You have the landlord or owner of two-thirds of the property contributing $765.87 toward its government, and the owners of one-third of the property contributing $190,000 toward the maintenance of the government over the same area. There is an argument in that which could not be improved upon by elaboration.

Then, where are we drifting? In 1909——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. The appropriation for this bureau——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HEYBURN. When I state these figures that I am in the midst of I will yield. In 1909 the appropriation was $3,151,900. In 1910 it was $3,986,000, an increase of more than $700,000. The last appropriation act carried $4,708,500, an addition of nearly $1,000,000, and this year it is to have another million dollars added to it.

Now I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the record ought to show in this connection what percentage of this land, the two-thirds in the county named, could be reduced to private occupancy and use and converted into homes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I wanted the record to show how much of this reserve land in Bonner County, I believe the Senator said, could be reduced to private occupancy and use, could be converted into homes, if the people had the privilege of going on it.

Mr. HEYBURN. All of it. The percentage of waste land in the county is less than it is in any county of which the Senator has knowledge. The land was not withdrawn because it was not suitable for home making. Every time an acre of it is released there is somebody right there to exercise the right of homestead on it; and if they doubt it, should they release it to-day they will see how fast it will be taken up. The climate is such that they can raise almost anything that the Temperate Zone will produce. It is a magnificent fruit country, one of the very best in the United States. When we had in 1892, I think, a great horticultural exhibit in the State of Idaho, the best exhibit there was the one from Bonner County, and it is now in a forest reserve. They actually included——

Mr. SMOOT. What reserve is it in?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is in Bonner County.

Mr. SMOOT. In what reserve?

Mr. HEYBURN. These reserves are named after Indians and sweethearts and planets, and are given all sorts of names. I would not undertake to specify their names. I looked it over this morning and I was charmed with the beautiful names that they have given these forests. I must not be held responsible for them at all, nor be expected to remember them.

Now, to go back to the figures, which will give some idea of the rate of increase represented by our succeeding appropriations, there has been an increase of nearly two millions in three years in the cost of administering this property, and a decrease in the product of this property represented by the figures I have here. In 1908 the income was $1,790,000, and in 1909 it was $1,765,000. We only fell off $35,000 in the product, and these are the figures that are given to us in this report right here. I can turn to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is simply one branch. If the Senator had taken both branches or all branches, I might say, of the income, it would have been more than that; and this year it will be about $2,500,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the figures here—the estimates that are given us. I merely took them off the paper; that was all. I found them, and I transferred them to this paper. I am correct in the figures. I will see that I am. It requires some considerable patience and genius to find anything in this report, but I think I have been able to figure them out. My figures are correct.

Mr. FLINT. I think the Senator will find that the receipts were about $1,870,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The exact amount for last year was $1,870,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. On the basis upon which the division was made last year, 1909, it was $1,765,000. The difference is not so material. I have taken the figures from the report. Of course there is a certain percentage that is distributed of this fund and a certain percentage to another, but it is hardly worth while to interrupt the argument for so slight a difference in the figures. I took them from the book I have here.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to call attention to the fact that this year it will be two and a half million dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is prophecy. I am talking about the actual receipts that have been realized, and I am talking about the year 1909. I have the figures before me; the amount is $1,765,000. That is the figure taken from the book, and I was comparing it with the year before—with 1908—showing the decrease in the income.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah where the estimate is found to which he has just called attention.

Mr. SMOOT. The estimate is not in this book, nor will it be printed until next year; but the actual amount already received is over $2,000,000, and the estimated amount up to June 30 will be over two and a half million dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How is it that the Senator has access to that estimate and the rest of us have not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can get it at any time he desires by going to the department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Ought we not to have it printed in connection with this bill? If the statement is to be made on the floor of the Senate that the amount is two and a half million dollars, ought we not to have some figures or some estimate to show it?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Idaho was stating that there was a decrease in the receipts from the forest reserves. I think they have increased from about $500,000 up until last year, when they were $1,870,000, and this year up to the present time the amount is over $2,000,000, and with an estimated amount at the end of this year, June 30, of $2,500,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That estimate is what I want to see.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it here, if the Senator please.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it would not be in the Book of Estimates, because it will come in next year.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it in the official publication.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not the official estimate. I want to know by what authority the Senator from Utah was speaking when he spoke of the estimate of the proceeds during the present year.

Mr. SMOOT. The actual receipts I get from the department up to date; that is, for the present fiscal year, which will end June 30, 1910. The Senator from Idaho has no estimate of that in the book before him. The estimate in that book is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly so.

Mr. SMOOT. I am simply stating what anyone can find out by asking at the department—what are the receipts from all sources from the forest reserves to the present time. That is exactly what I am giving.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is what I am trying to get at. I would be glad if the department would furnish that statement instead of having merely a statement made on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are entitled to have it as the basis of our authority to make this appropriation for the next year. An estimate is not something pertaining to last year. That we know, and we need no estimate. The Constitution of the United States says that our appropriations must be based upon estimates. Now, where is the estimate upon which this appropriation is based? Of course, I know we have forgotten the Constitution so much that——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; briefly.

Mr. SMOOT. The receipts from forest reserves go direct into the Treasury. They have nothing to do with what we shall appropriate for the forest reserves. The estimates given there are the estimates that will be required to administer the forest reserves of this country. If we should take into consideration all we receive, of course that would be a different proposition; but the Senator was arguing the point that there was an increase in the expense of administration, and he then mentioned as a fact that the receipts from the reserves were growing less.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware of the fact that the income at present, very much against the will and wishes of the bureau, does go into the Treasury of the United States; and we do not have the bureau to thank for that, but we have the wisdom of the United States Senate, that compelled them to pay the receipts into the Treasury. The item that I referred to as the income was so closely connected with the suggestion that was made that I had to speak of the estimate, because it was all one transaction. I have here the figures. The net receipts from all sources, in this official statement, were $1,766,088.46. That is what it says, net receipts, and that includes all these items. The gross receipts were $1,807,270.66. This is rather an interesting table. It is nice to know how these sums come to us. Here are the names of the national forests. Moapa. That is a nice name. I do not know where the names came from. Inyo and Wenaha. The Senator wanted to know some of the names. I am just giving a sample of them. Those are poetic people. This whole scheme is based upon a poetic imagination, and I am not at all surprised to find these names given to the forest reserves.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the name of Moapa is concerned, the forest reserves had nothing whatever to do with the name, because it has been known in the western country ever since the pioneers first went there.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is probably one of the historic places in the United States, but I will pass to things of more importance. There are the timber sales. Let us just give our attention to the sources from which this income is derived. We have been dealing with millions, but the timber sales amount to only $619,664. I have the whole table before me. That is supposed to be one of the most important purposes for which all this vast area of 200,000,000 acres of land is withdrawn from the legitimate and proper use of all the land in the world. The land of this earth has only one use, and that is to furnish a footstool for the human being. When it is devoted to any other it is being diverted. Then, from timber settlement—this is the hold-up element of it—from timber settlement, $44,172.63. Do you know what those timber settlements are?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know a man who paid $25 and something over, who was traveling over the public lands of the United States and over private roads and public roads to get his family to the State of Washington. His stock was travel worn. He stopped by the roadside and camped with his family along a stream that was in a forest reserve in Idaho, and the forestry officer charged him pasturage for the stock that was pulling his wagon containing his family, and held him up until he paid it. I have in my possession a number of such cases that are absolutely authentic.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me proceed, because the Senator does not know that man.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that charge was for grazing, and what the Senator has read was for timber settlement. So it can not have any reference to the story he has told.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to give the Senate then an illustration along the line on which the Senator's mind is moving. For years the town of Wallace received its wood supply over the railroad coming into the wood yard, where it was for sale as other wood yards sell their merchandise. People had been buying their wood there, ordering it generally early in the season. It was delivered to them, and they used it in their houses and buildings of various kinds. One fine day they nearly all received a bill or statement from the Forester to the effect that they owed so much money for so many cords of wood, claiming that the party from whom either the wood yard or the user purchased it had taken it off the public lands of the United States. Those were the inhabitants of a town or of a community that contributes to the prosperity of the United States to as great an extent as any like community in the United States. Our product in that little community is about $25,000,000 a year. Those people, buying in the open market the wood for household purposes, either had to stand a suit or pay the bills. They paid those bills. That is what I call a "hold up," and a good specimen of one, too.

Mr. FLINT. Does the Senator think that is a new doctrine?

Mr. HEYBURN. A new doctrine? Why, no; you read in the most ancient history of hold ups.

Mr. FLINT. As I understand it, what those people had bought was stolen property; and the Government asked to be compensated for the property that had been stolen from it.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the people of the United States or of any other civilized country were to have their laws administered in the spirit of that expression, there never would have been a government and there would be no people in the United States.

Mr. FLINT. We have been proceeding for years against people who have bought timber which had been taken from the public domain, which had been cut and sold and had gotten into the hands of innocent parties—stolen property.

Mr. HEYBURN. Stolen property!

Mr. FLINT. Property taken from the public domain.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose the Senator and I start to drive in California across the public lands and allow our horses to pasture during the hour of luncheon, would we be open to the charge of stealing the grass from the Government that the horses should eat?

Mr. FLINT. I think not. I think that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to get away from the question of ethical morality when it gets down to such fine and attenuated points.

Timber trespass, $37,748.69.
Grazing—

Ah! here is the rub; here is the secret of it—

Grazing, $1,019,062.93.

That is what the forest reserves were created for very largely, in order that they might exercise that most cherished function of some people—the control of others. Grazing on forest reserves, that are more valuable for their timber than for any other purpose, yields, according to the Government's own statement, a third more for some other purpose than it does for its timber. "Grazing;" that means grass grows. So it does—native grass. Timothy and white clover are the native grasses in those forests. You can throw the bridle off of your stock almost anywhere and turn them loose, and they will find it, winter or summer, unless the snow is too deep in the winter time, and yet the principal income from these forest reserves is not from forest purposes or uses at all, but from some other purpose. I merely want to call attention to these conditions, because some day, if we have occasion—and I hope that we never shall—to go after these forest reserves, as we have had to go after them in the past, we shall have some foundation knowledge on the subject.

I am going to leave the discussion of this measure, so far as I am concerned, resting in the hope that the American people and those who represent them are becoming sane, and that they are learning that the old parrot-like expression that these lands belong to the people of the East as well as the people of the West means nothing. They belong to the people of the East if they go West. The people of the East never considered future generations that were to settle in the West when they were gobbling up the lands in the East. I have looked over a good many of the grants that were taken up in our Atlantic States, and I find that they were not a bit modest as to size or quantity. The same is true all the way from the Atlantic coast to the Missouri River and to the Rocky Mountains. I never heard of a man being restrained by his scruples against taking all the land in Nebraska that he could get under the law. I have been told by Senators from Nebraska on this floor that the government lands in Idaho belong as much to the people in Nebraska as to the people in Idaho. That statement is not strictly true. The right to take those lands belongs to them equally if they have not already drawn their rations. You can not draw your rations twice under the public-land laws of the United States.

This reminds me of a condition. A line of soldiers come up and draw their daily rations, then slip around behind, get into the front line again, and draw them again. That is what it amounts to. People resting in the comfort and security and the sunshine of wealth, because of having drawn their rations so long ago that they think the generations in the West have forgotten it, want to get into line and draw them over again. That is what it amounts to. [Laughter.] We are not only entitled to administer the estate within our State, but in so administering it we contribute to the wealth of the Nation.

What section of the country has contributed as much to the support, the welfare, and the salvation of this country as those States in which the public lands lie? The State of Idaho during the most trying period in the history of this country produced over $200,000,000 in gold, that needed not even the stamp of the coiner on it to make it current, to meet the expenses of the Government when there was no other treasury to draw on except that of promise. That was the only real mint to draw on at that time. That has been repeated and repeated.

The State of Nevada has contributed, I think I am safe in saying, $400,000,000 to the wealth of this country. It has put it in circulation; it has put it where it stays for the prosperity of the country. It has helped build your battle ships and float your navies and erect your public buildings. They do not send it down here in wheat sacks, nor in wool bags, but they send it down here in bars of gold that are weighed and estimated at a fixed value.

The same was true of Idaho. From 1860 to 1865 we produced and sent into the channels of trade more than $200,000,000 in raw gold. From 1894 to this day we have in the county in which I live produced and sent into the channels of trade nearly $400,000,000. We are ready to assume our responsibility. I say these things not in boast, but to remind the people who may hear them or read them that we are not beggars at the back door of this Nation, nor have we ever been.

Now, what kind of treatment are we entitled to at the hands of the nonresident landlord, who comes in and seeks to stagnate the growth and prosperity of our country? What kind of treatment are we entitled to, based upon our record? Idaho, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, and all that great West is settled by men who laid the foundation for their capacity to participate in responsible government in the East and in the great Middle West.

They peopled your colleges; they took with them letters of credit that bore the sign manual of the best educational institutions in the East. I can find a higher percentage of Yale and Harvard and Princeton men in the mines in Idaho than you can find in the city in which you live. Why? Because they have come to the land of opportunity; they have come there, not to be always delvers and diggers in the soil, but to lay the foundation of their competency, the very groundwork of the country. Our state university sends its classes into the mines during the vacation days to learn how to mine, that they may know later how to manage a mine, and to study the engineering, the geology, the chemical, and the industrial conditions. If you imagine that we are out there on the frontier like a lot of helpless aliens, incompetent of sharing in the management of the Government of which we are as much a part as any other part, you never made a greater mistake in your life. It is not inherited wealth in that country; it is wealth won by toil, skill, and intelligent devotion to the interest of life in that country; and that is the class of men for whom we speak when we say, "Turn those lands open to settlement."

As I have said before on this floor, I would rather have one man on an acre of land than a thousand trees. He counts more for the present and the future of the country, east and west, north and south, than all the solitudes upon which the midnight sun may rest.

It was suggested here that the Government had great game preserves, and that the beautiful deer might be preserved from destruction. I would rather have one Alderney cow than all the herds of deer that you could put upon acres of ground.

I have no doubt that the beautiful spotted fawns would look more beautiful to our friends from the East when they come out there, but they perhaps would not care a snap about seeing the western people driving up the lowing kine. They would rather see them shooting deer; but we are talking about practical life and practical government and practical things, and we are substituting cities for forests; we are trading off the timber for civilization, and you come out there and undertake to stay our hand!

If somebody had stayed the hand of settlement along the Atlantic coast and made the settler get permission of a British forester before he could cut the timber to make his home, New England would not yet have stepped back 10 miles from the ocean. You would be wondering why you came to the country of opportunity, and you would never have known there was a Pacific coast. There would have been the solitude of a forest reserve from the Connecticut River west.

Mr. President, it was not my intention to speak at even the length that I have detained the Senate, because, as I have said, I am going to rest upon the assurance I have in mind that we are becoming sane in this country and that we have passed that period of hysteria and speculation that has held us in its thrall for a number of years. I want, first, before I criticise further, to see whether or not the things of which we have been critical will be changed; and, if they are, there is nobody who will welcome the condition more than the people on the Pacific coast. They do not want to be at strife with the Government; they love it as much as do the people of any other part of the country. They want the United States, of which they are a part, to include them in the family of equal rights and equal consideration.

So, Mr. President, let the responsibility for this measure, which is fashioned somewhat after its predecessors, rest with the administration, and I believe that the administration is now in a mood to look more closely into the manner of the execution of the laws entrusted to it; but do not let a word that I have said be taken as an encouragement to the belief that we will stand the creation of more reserves. This present administration has very much diminished the reserves.

It had been my intention to discuss here on this occasion to some extent the question of water rights; but inasmuch as that measure is coming before the Senate in connection with the consideration of another subject I shall defer doing so, and, also in view of the fact that I am only about able to stand on my feet to-day, I shall not offer any amendment at this time, at least, to this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which had been passed over was under the head of "Forest Service," in the item of appropriation for "General expenses, Forest Service," on page 25, line 13, before the word "agents," to strike out "fiscal and other;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the exportation of dead and insect-infested timber only from said Black Hills National Forest shall be allowed until such time as the forester shall certify that the ravages of the destructive insects in said forests are practically checked, but in no case after July 1, 1912; to transport and care for fish and game supplied to stock the national forests or the waters therein; to employ agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in practical forestry and in the administration of national forests, in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 8, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 7, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, we rejoice with exceeding great joy for that larger vision of Thyself which is coming gradually into the minds and hearts of men, for the relationship which exists between Thee and mankind, and for the larger interpretation of life and its far-reaching purposes. We most fervently pray that we may be able to distinguish clearly between aspiration and ignoble, selfish desires, liberty and license, temperance and intemperance, truth and dogma, religion and theology, the true and the false, righteousness and hypocrisy, and that we may be imbued with fidelity to all that is purest and noblest in life and build for ourselves a character after the pattern of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 5, 1910, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DEPEW, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the same.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the following title:

H. R. 19558. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to effect an exchange of a certain parcel of land owned by the United States for another parcel owned by the Cave Hill Cemetery Company, of Louisville, Ky.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19403) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5876. An act to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 5876. An act to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

CORRECTION.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct an exhibit [Exhibit I] which I submitted in the RECORD of March 2, in connection with my speech on the high cost of living. During the progress of that debate I was speaking of the lower prices paid in Boston for provisions than in nine other ports of the world by the Massachusetts training ship Ranger. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asked this question:

Is it a fact that they buy when they are at home, at the port of Boston, by annual contract and buy in foreign ports at chance?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I can not tell the gentleman, but I recognize the importance of this question. I shall inquire.

Mr. Speaker, I inquired, or, rather, I called up a friend over the long-distance telephone, and he made the inquiry. Probably through my own fault in not expressing myself properly, the full bearing of the question was not understood. I received the following answer:

Figures furnished are for the cruise of Massachusetts training ship Ranger in 1909. Provisions bought wholesale on competitive bids both in Boston and foreign ports.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the answer is somewhat misleading. It has since been called to my attention by the Massachusetts training-ship commission that Mr. BORLAND was perfectly correct in the question that he asked. I desire unanimous consent to make the necessary change in Exhibit I. The facts are as follows: Provisions for the Ranger are bought in Boston on a contract similar to a hotel contract, which runs for several months at a time. In foreign ports provisions sufficient to last for short periods are bought at wholesale for a ship's company of some 125 men. The fresh supplies are bought to the extent that they will last in cruising from one port to another in the Atlantic or the Mediterranean. I therefore ask unanimous consent to correct Exhibit I, inasmuch as it is at present misleading.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman whether the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] made any answer in reply? Well, Mr. Speaker, I see that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is present.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not remember any further reply.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection on my part to the gentleman making the correction he desires. The telegram which he inserted as Exhibit I is clearly misleading, and if the gentleman will put in the true facts there can be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. This is unanimous-consent day, and the Clerk will proceed to call the calendar.

SECOND HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15660) providing for second homestead entries.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who, prior to the passage of this act, has made entry under the homestead laws, but from any cause has lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead law as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a second homestead under this act shall furnish the description and date of his former entry: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person whose former entry was canceled for fraud.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That any person who, prior to February 8, 1908, made entry under the homestead laws, but who, subsequently to such entry, from any cause shall have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead laws as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a second homestead entry under this act shall furnish a description and the date of his former entry: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person whose former entry was canceled for fraud, or who relinquished his former entry for a valuable consideration in excess of the filing fees paid by him on his original entry."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman two or three questions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Dakota yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I would first like to have the report read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, consent has not been granted as yet for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The report would have to be read by unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MANN. Reading the report would not give us any information.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why is this date fixed as February 8, 1908?

Mr. GRONNA. That is to conform with the law that was passed in 1908. The committee did not feel that they wanted to extend the time for the making of entry, but simply extend the time to give the entrymen who might abandon subsequent to that time an opportunity to reenter. I will say that similar bills were passed in 1904 and in 1900 giving the entrymen the right to a new entry providing it could not be shown that he had lost his former entry through fraud or for a consideration. It was the intention of the committee that the department should grant to these entrymen not only up to the date of February 9, 1908, but in the future the right to reenter lands under the homestead laws, where the entryman had not enjoyed the benefit under the homestead laws.

But it was drawn in such shape or such form that it can not be interpreted in any other way than to say that if an abandonment was made subsequent to the passage of this bill another entry can not be allowed by the department. The gentleman will see by reading the report made by the department that they suggested a much more liberal bill than the committee has recommended.

Mr. MANN. Well, hardly.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, I think so. I think it is more liberal than the one the committee has recommended. All this bill does, Mr. Speaker, is simply to give to the department authority to grant another entry to a homesteader who may have lost or may lose his entry subsequent to the passage of the act of 1908.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. I understand that this bill when introduced was referred to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And in that report they transmitted a draft of a substitute bill?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MANN. And in that draft of a substitute bill it provided for second homestead entry to those persons "who, through no fault or neglect of his own, may have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same." Now, in the draft of the substitute as presented by the committee is provided, "that any person who from any cause shall have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same," and so forth, may have a second homestead entry. Does the gentleman undertake to say that the substitute bill offered by the committee is less liberal than the substitute bill offered by the department which only gives the right when a party has not lost his homestead through fault or neglect of his own?

Mr. GRONNA. I say that the department bill is more liberal; the substitute bill contains limitations not in the department bill.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but you put two limitations in your bill and one is that the cancellation must not have been for fraud.

Mr. GRONNA. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. And the other is that the homestead must not have been relinquished for a valuable consideration in excess of the filing fees paid on the original entry, but both of these provisions are in the draft of the department's bill, so you only took that part of the department's bill, and the department's bill contains other restrictions which you did not put in your bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the gentleman it is absolutely the same as the law of 1908 in that respect. There is no change in the present law.

Mr. MANN. There was no change in the draft of the department bill from the present law in that respect, but there is a decided change in the draft of the committee substitute in that respect. Now, I do not wish to argue the question with the gentleman, but I do desire to say this: I remember the original discussion upon this bill, and I think it is altogether too important a bill to pass upon it by unanimous consent. The Committee on Public Lands will soon be called on call of committees, and it seems to me only fair that a bill of this sort should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I have the law if the gentleman desires to read it——

Mr. MANN. I have examined the law in this connection.

Mr. ADAIR. Is this a unanimous report on this bill?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many homesteaders will this affect?

Mr. GRONNA. It is not an easy matter for me to say, but it will affect a great number; there is no question about that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will it give an opportunity for a homestead to those who have once gotten a homestead?

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, no; it only gives those who have lost their homesteads through no fault of their own the right to reenter.

Mr. MANN. That is not in the substitute bill; it has nothing in it about any fault of their own.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the bill recommended by the department, not the committee's bill.

Mr. MANN. I think the bill ought not to receive consideration——

Mr. GRONNA. It conforms to the law of February 9, 1908.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have indicated, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

LAWTON AND FORT SILL ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next bill on the calendar for unanimous consent was the bill (H. R. 19628) to authorize the Lawton and Fort Sill Electric Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Lawton and Fort Sill Electric Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to survey, locate, construct, maintain, and operate a railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, in Comanche County, State of Oklahoma, upon such line or lines as may be determined and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines, and for no other purpose, a right of way 50 feet in width through said Fort Sill Military Reservation, with the right to use such additional ground where cuts and fills may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no part of the land herein authorized to be taken shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, telephone, and trolley lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That before the said railway company shall be permitted to enter upon any part of said military reservation a description by metes and bounds of the land herein authorized to be taken shall be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the said railway company shall comply with such other regulations and conditions in the maintenance and operation of said road as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

In line 11, page 1, strike out the word "take" and insert in lieu thereof the word "occupy."

On page 2, line 7, strike out the words "taken shall be" and insert in lieu thereof the words "occupied or."

Line 15, page 2, strike out the word "taken" and insert in lieu thereof the words "occupied or used."

At the end of the bill add the following:

"SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby exclusively reserved."

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask somebody in charge of this bill a question. I see no provision here for paying compensation.

Mr. FERRIS. There is no provision of that kind.

Mr. GAINES. Why is it that where a railroad company takes the public land it is not provided they should pay some kind of compensation, the same as a private individual would who got a grant of land from the Government?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, this is an electric line proposed to be built at the town of Lawton, Okla., my home town. The town is not a large town, with about 10,000 population, perhaps a little more. The military post is 5 miles from the town. The town and the post standing alone are not large enough to support an electric line. A number of local citizens have formed a little company and have agreed to hazard their own capital in building a line from the town over to the post. It is a courageous thing for them to build it, in any event. I might add further that my interest, of course, is to enable my home town to have the car service, but there is an additional interest which the Government has. At this time the Government is making some improvements at Fort Sill and employing a large number of men. They have to procure the help from Lawton, Okla., 5 miles away.

The necessity for the line is that at this time they have to arrange with the Rock Island Railroad to run a plug train out in the morning and back at night, which makes it unpleasant for the laborers and hard for the Government to get the necessary help to carry on the work there. So both the Government and the city are very desirous of having the line; and it parallels two lines of railroad. It is left, as the gentleman will observe, absolutely to the Secretary of War to make the proposed electric line parallel the two railway lines now there. And they do not get a grant in fee; they merely get a right to use the right of way.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I might add to what the gentleman has said that the department is desirous of having the road for the convenience of the post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES. I will not object, but I think it is a dangerous practice to do this sort of thing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment, page 2, line 25, by striking out the word "exclusively" and inserting the word "expressly."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 25, page 2, strike out "exclusively" and insert "expressly."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WATERWORKS BONDS, DOUGLAS, ARIZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13401) to enable the city of Douglas, Cochise County, Ariz., to issue bonds for the purpose of acquiring and constructing a waterworks plant in and for said city.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Douglas, Cochise County, Ariz., a municipal corporation duly organized and existing as a city under the general laws of said Territory, be, and it is hereby, authorized to incur and contract an indebtedness to the amount of $325,000 for the acquisition of an adequate system of waterworks in and for said city by the purchase of the existing waterworks plant therein at a price not to exceed the sum of $225,000 and by the construction of additional waterworks by the way of the enlargement and extension of said plant at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000; and to issue its negotiable coupon bonds to said aggregate amount of $325,000.

SEC. 2. That the acts and proceedings of the mayor and common council of said city of Douglas in and about the calling, holding, ascertaining, and declaring the result of a special election in said city on October 16, 1909, on the following proposition: "Shall the city of Douglas, Cochise County, Territory of Arizona, borrow the sum of $325,000 and issue its negotiable coupon bonds therefor for the purpose of acquiring the existing waterworks plant and constructing additional waterworks in and for said city, of which sum $225,000 is to be expended for the purchase of said existing waterworks plant, and not exceeding the sum of $100,000 is to be expended for said additional waterworks construction," and in and about the passage on December 6, 1909, of ordinance No. 93, entitled "An ordinance providing for the issuance of negotiable coupon bonds of the city of Douglas, Ariz., to the amount of $325,000, for the purpose of providing funds for acquiring the existing waterworks plant in said city and constructing additional waterworks in and for said city; prescribing the forms of said bonds and of the interest coupons to be thereto attached, providing for an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on and principal of said bonds when due, and fixing the other details of the issue," be, and the same are hereby, in all respects, declared fully authorized, ratified, approved and confirmed, and the bonds of said city of Douglas, when executed and issued pursuant to the provisions of said ordinance No. 93, shall be, and the same are hereby, declared to constitute the valid and binding obligations of said city, and all of the taxable property in said city to be subject to the levy of a direct annual tax sufficient to pay the principal of and interest on said bonds when due.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like some explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CAMERON. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Can the gentleman explain this bill, which appears to bond a city of 5,000 inhabitants for $325,000?

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to grant to the city of Douglas, in the Territory of Arizona, the right to issue bonds to purchase and construct a system of waterworks. The waterworks system in the city of Douglas at the present time is inadequate for the needs of the city. This act is to enable the city to issue bonds to purchase the present waterworks system at the price of $225,000, and enlarge the plant by making additions thereto to the extent of $100,000, so that the city will have plenty of water to supply the growing demand of the rapidly increasing population of the city, which has been very great in the last few years. This act has been recommended for passage by the committee, and has also been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and was adopted by a majority vote of the people of the city of Douglas, in which it is proposed to construct an improved waterworks system.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what would be a proper amount to bond a city of this size, although it may have grown up very rapidly in the last two or three years. If those who are familiar with this do not object, I will not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNET of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OIL AND GAS PIPE LINES OVER PUBLIC DOMAIN IN ARKANSAS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13419) to grant right of way over the public domain in the State of Arkansas for oil and gas pipe lines.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That a right of way through the public lands of the United States in the State of Arkansas is hereby granted for pipe-line purposes to any citizen of the United States, or any company or corporation authorized by its charter to transport oil, crude or refined, or natural gas, which shall have filed or may hereafter file with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proof of organization under the same, to the extent of the ground occupied by the said pipe line and 10 feet on each side of the center line of same.

SEC. 2. That any citizen of the United States, company, or corporation desiring to secure the benefits of this act shall within twelve months after the location of 10 miles of the public line, if the same be upon surveyed land, and if the same be upon unsurveyed lands within twelve months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a map of its lines, and upon the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior, the same shall be noted upon the plats in said office, and thereafter all such land over which such line shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such right of way.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act shall authorize the use of such right of way except for the pipe line, and then only so far as may be necessary for its construction, maintenance, and care.

SEC. 4. That if any section of said pipe line shall not be completed within one year after the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of said section, or if such pipe line or any section thereof shall be abandoned, or shall not be used for the transportation of oil, or natural gas, for a period of two years, the rights herein granted shall be forfeited and shall revert to the United States without further action or declaration, and the reservation of such land for the purposes of said right of way shall cease and become null and void without further action.

SEC. 5. That if any person, or association of persons, availing themselves of the benefits of this act, or any company or corporation availing itself of the benefits of this act, shall violate the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" (commonly known as the Sherman antitrust act), or any amendment thereof, all rights herein granted shall be forfeited and shall revert to the United States without further action or declaration on the part of the Government, and the reservation of such land for the purposes of said right of way shall cease and become null and void without further action on the part of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why the Senate bill was not put on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, it having been reported to the House for over a week?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman in charge of the bill, for some reason or other, overlooked that matter; and it might be well to ask that the Senate bill be now substituted for the House bill, just as the gentleman from Illinois, in a similar case, did a week ago.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman substituted a bill which, under the rule, he could have substituted if it had been on the Speaker's table. This, however, is a bill that is on the Union Calendar and is entirely different.

Mr. MONDELL. The situation is in no sense essentially different, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well; before that question comes up, may I ask the gentleman, in reference to the House bill, are the Senate and House bills identically the same?

Mr. MONDELL. They are practically in identical language, but there are one or two minor differences.

Mr. MANN. I notice the House bill provides that any citizen may secure the benefit of this act. What is the purpose of saying that? Why are not the provisions of this act limited to the persons who it is intended to get this right to run this pipe line?

Mr. MONDELL. Because it is a general law, and it is intended to allow the right generally. While it is true that there is one pipe-line company now proposing to build a line, and already constructing a line, unquestionably in the course of time there will be other companies desirous of building pipe lines.

Mr. MANN. So the purpose of this act is not to confine to a given pipe line now in existence the right to construct this line?

Mr. MONDELL. That is not the intention.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, are there any unsurveyed lands in Arkansas where this existing pipe line wants to run?

Mr. MONDELL. There are not.

Mr. MANN. So that the term "unsurveyed" is intended to apply to other parts of Arkansas, and not merely this particular location that has been discussed so much in the press and elsewhere?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think this would affect this particular line. I think they pass over nothing but surveyed lands.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, further, if this section of this line is not constructed, who gets the title to the property where the line has already been constructed?

Mr. MONDELL. Over public land?

Mr. MANN. Over public land.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, in case the line is not constructed, and the provisions of the bill are not complied with, the land reverts to the Government.

Mr. MANN. Well, suppose this case: Under the provisions of this act, if an application is made for a 10-mile section, and that section should not be constructed, then as to the section of land where the pipe line had been constructed, the authority at once becomes null and void? When the land has been taken up under the laws of the United States, who gets the ownership of the strip of land where this pipe line has already been constructed by the forfeiture or because it is not constructed somewhere else?

Mr. MONDELL. The owner of the land.

Mr. MANN. Well, what does this mean——

Mr. MONDELL. The moment the easement ceases to operate, of course, the title is in the owner.

Mr. MANN. What does this mean:

All rights herein granted shall be forfeited and shall revert to the United States without further action or declaration on the part of the Government.

Does that mean that gives the ownership of that part of the line already constructed to the homestead man; and if it does not, and reverts to the United States, what does it mean?

Mr. MONDELL. The title reverts to the United States and through the United States to its grantee.

Mr. MANN. He would have the ownership?

Mr. MONDELL. Of all the land on which they failed to construct.

Mr. MANN. Then this situation might easily arise.

This pipe line is constructed across the public domain, all except one little part, and they make application for additional authority to construct over that part and forfeit their right to any part; but meanwhile they have had employees of the company take up the land and thereby, having forfeited to the United States, the result is that they own it themselves. Does the gentleman follow me?

Mr. MONDELL. I regret to say that I do not fully. I think the matter is very simple.

Mr. MANN. I think it is very simple, too.

Mr. MONDELL. It is the ordinary right-of-way legislation, except that we have added to it a definite provision of forfeiture. This is the only change from the ordinary pipe-line legislation, a provision of definite, automatic forfeiture. Now, the gentleman certainly would not object to that provision for an automatic forfeiture, for if that were not in the bill, then in case the person or company applying for the right of way did not comply with the law, or for any reason subjected itself to forfeiture, and some one else desired to build a line over that tract, it would be necessary for them to go into court and by court proceedings have a forfeiture declared.

Mr. MANN. Can anybody homestead this land?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; it is subject to homestead entry.

Mr. MANN. So that if a pipe-line company had its employees homestead the land, and thereafter forfeited its rights, the land and the pipe line upon it would belong to its employees, who could immediately transfer it over to the pipe line, so that your imaginary forfeiture amounts to nothing.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. If you want to forfeit this right, it should be forfeited to the Government of the United States, which should have title to the ground.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me answer the gentleman. It seems to me his question raises no point at all. This land is all subject to homestead entry. If the pipe-line company desired to secure the land by inducing homesteaders to go upon it, they could do it. There is no difficulty about their doing that if they want to violate the law. It is not necessary for them to come here for a right of way if they desire to violate the law by getting somebody to go upon the land and homestead it in their interest. I assume that could be done; but evidently there is no disposition to do anything of that sort.

The pipe-line companies desire a right of way. They are not seeking to acquire any land. They simply want a right of way. We grant them the right of way, and we grant it partly in order to take away from them any sort of excuse or temptation to take the public land except for pipe-line purposes. Having done that, we say that if they do not comply with the provisions of the law the land which they occupy shall revert. Of course in the meantime anyone can homestead the land.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by having the right revert to the Government? If it is forfeited, that ends it. If it reverts to the Government, the Government becomes the owner of it.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Government can not become the owner of this and the man who has a homestead also become the owner of it at the same time.

Mr. MONDELL. Whichever horn of the dilemma the gentleman takes——

Mr. MANN. I prefer to have the law define it, so that I know which horn of the dilemma to take.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me it is not material. My own opinion is that if this automatic forfeiture occurs, the easement having been taken from the land, that cloud having been removed, the title in fee rests in the owner. But if the gentleman does not think that is good law, then the title to the right of way or the easement still remains in the Federal Government. There can be no objection to that, if that is the legal status.

Mr. MANN. Do you not think we ought to know its legal status when we get through?

Mr. MONDELL. My opinion is that if this right of way should be forfeited and revert to the Government, being only an easement for a certain purpose, the ownership would be in the entryman.

Mr. GAINES. If the gentleman will permit me, the bill distinctly and clearly says that if the easement is forfeited it reverts to the Government of the United States. Now, that necessarily would not do the homesteader very great harm, because a pipe line is buried in the earth.

If the Department of the Interior knows anything about the business, it is presumed it will know enough to require the pipe line to be buried a sufficient depth under the surface, and the pipe line would do the owner no particular harm. I can conceive where this sort of a case might occur, where there would be a forfeiture because of the noncompletion of a pipe line, and where assurance might afterwards be given that the company intended vigorously to prosecute the work, and it might be desirable to let them go to work again. In the meantime, the question of transferring that right of way to the homestead man would not intervene, no harm at all being done to the surface. If it were found out that this location, evidently well selected for a pipe line, was not to be used, and it became later known that there was no desire afterwards to use it, the Government could relinquish the easement of the pipe line.

Mr. MANN. Under the gentleman's reading of the bill, if the company does not comply with the terms of this act so that the right herein granted as a forfeiture, whether that right or ownership of the grant reverts to the Government of the United States?

Mr. GAINES. Unquestionably.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman say about this provision:

> And the reservation of such lands for the purposes of said right of way shall cease and become null and void without further action.

One part of the bill says it reverts to the Government, and the other part says it ends in smoke.

Mr. GAINES. No; the particular reservation to that company thereby ends. I think the provisions are harmonious.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make the bill so that the different parts will chime in with each other. The difficulty comes from the fact that the bill having been once drafted in good order, so that it was harmonious, having been sent to the department and the department having recommended a bill which was harmonious, the distinguished gentleman, in connection with the bill, offered a lot of amendments which are inharmonious, and there is no pretense that this bill in itself does not contradict itself.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman's statement is in accordance with the facts. The Department of the Interior time and again has called the attention of the Committee on the Public Lands to the fact that all future legislation providing rights of way should contain some provision for automatic forfeiture. I have discussed that matter several times on the floor of the House. It was necessary, because the railway right-of-way act contains no such provision, to bring in a bill in the last Congress to provide a congressional forfeiture. Now, in spite of the fact that the Interior Department has been insisting that there should be a provision for automatic forfeiture in right-of-way acts, when they reported on this particular measure they made no suggestion for the declaration of forfeiture.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman will pardon me. Let me refresh the gentleman's recollection. Section 3 of the draft of the bill which was sent by the department to the gentleman's committee is this:

> SEC. 3. That if any section of said pipe line shall not be completed within five years after the location of such section, the right herein granted shall be forfeited as to any uncompleted section of said pipe line to the extent that the same is not completed at the date of the forfeiture.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the exact language in the railway right-of-way act, and the courts have decided that does not effect a forfeiture; that it is a declaration of conditions under which forfeiture may be enforced; and that there can be no forfeiture under that language except by act of Congress or action in the courts. In order that it may not be necessary to clear the public domain of unused rights of way by acts of Congress when they are not utilized, the desire of the committee was to do just what the department has insisted that we ought to do.

Mr. MANN. Who determines in any case whether a forfeiture exists, a department official or the court?

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose in this case a department officer.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman advocate a proposition, where we give a right of way to people to spend a large amount of money on the government domain, that some inferior clerk in the Interior Department shall be permitted to start in operation a movement which in the end deprives these people of the money they have expended, without any authorization or decree of the court?

Mr. MONDELL. I grant that that is an important question, but I think Congress can make a conditional grant, which may cease to operate by declaration of the Secretary of the Interior if certain conditions are not complied with.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SALE AND SURVEY OF CERTAIN LANDS IN STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15820) providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands in abandoned military reservations Nos. 23 and 24, described as follows: Lots 1 and 2 in section 5 and lot 3 in section 6, of township 20 north, and the southwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and lots 3 and 4 of section 21, and the northwest quarter, the west half of the northeast quarter, lots 1, 2, and 3, and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28, and the south half of lot 3 and all of lots 4 and 5, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 31, the south half of the south half of the northwest quarter, the south half of the south half of the northeast quarter, and lots 1 and 2 and the west half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter and the southwest quarter of section 32, and the south half of lot 2 and all of lot 3 of section 33, in township 21 north, all in range 2 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington, or any part thereof, to be regularly surveyed or subdivided into tracts or lots of 20 acres each, more or less.

SEC. 2. That after said survey and the approval thereof by the Commissioner of the General Land Office the plat thereof shall be filed in the office of the register and receiver in the manner provided by law, and thereafter any settler who is in actual occupation of any portion of the lands described in section 1 hereof at the date of the passage of this act who has settled thereon in good faith for the purpose of securing a home, and is by law entitled to make a homestead entry, shall be entitled to enter the land so occupied, not exceeding 20 acres in a body, according to the government surveys and subdivisions thereof, upon payment to the Government of the sum of $2.50 per acre for each acre entered by him, and upon showing residence and cultivation of such lands in the manner and for the length of time required by the homestead laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the following described land, being a part of abandoned military reservation No. 24, is hereby granted to school district No. 71, of Pierce County, State of Washington, to wit: The east half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 32, in township 21, of range 2 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington, upon payment therefor to the United States of $2.50 per acre.

SEC. 4. That if any of the lands described in section 1 hereof be not duly entered as a homestead by some settler, as provided in section 1 of this act, within ninety days after the same become subject to entry under the provisions of this act, then, in that event, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to dispose of such remaining lands under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, entitled "An act to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations."

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all of sections 2 and 4.

Make section 3 section 2 of the bill.

Insert as section 3 of the bill the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to dispose of the lands described in section 1 hereof, under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, entitled 'An act to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations:' Provided, however, That any settler who prior to December 1, 1909, was in actual occupation of any of such lands in good faith for the purpose of securing a home shall be entitled to enter the lands so occupied, not exceeding 20 acres in a body, according to the government surveys and subdivisions thereof, and to own the buildings and improvements thereon, upon payment to the Government of the appraised value thereof, less the value of the buildings and improvements thereon and the increased value of the land caused by the improvement thereof, which values the appraisers are hereby directed to report: And provided further, That the right of any such actual settler must be exercised within ninety days after the survey provided in section 1 hereof shall have been made and the same shall have been approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the plat thereof shall have been filed in the office of the register and receiver in the manner provided by law."

Amend the title by striking out the words "homestead entry" and substituting therefor the words "survey and sale."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of the bill. I notice in the report that the land referred to has virtually been settled by various settlers. I wish to inquire what is the purpose of the last section that has just been read as to settlers paying the value of the land but not paying anything for the improvements?

Mr. McCREDIE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is that they shall pay to the United States the value of the land, but that they shall get the benefit of their improvements and the increase of the land due to their improvements. A great many settlers have settled on this land and have made improvements valued at from $300 to $1,500. They are actual bona fide settlers. In fact, the law applies only to actual bona fide settlers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did those settlers make their entry under any law?

Mr. McCREDIE. There was no law that they could make it under.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are squatters on public land formerly used for a military reservation?

Mr. McCREDIE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they squatted upon it with the expectation that their rights would be observed?

Mr. McCREDIE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then this is virtually an enabling act.

Mr. McCREDIE. Some two years before this there was a reservation opened up in the same way, and there was a law passed permitting them to homestead it, and I presume that was an inducement for the people here to make the same settlements. The committee changed it from homesteading, requiring them to buy at an appraised value.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the present bill the present settlers are obliged to pay the appraised value of the land?

Mr. McCREDIE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Excepting therefrom the value of the improvements that the settlers may have made on the respective parcels?

Mr. McCREDIE. That is right. This gives them the preference to protect what they have.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the character of the land?

Mr. McCREDIE. It is reasonable agricultural land, with a little growth of scrubby timber on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. How is it that the settlements comprise such small portions as 20 acres of land?

Mr. McCREDIE. It is so close to Tacoma. It is only 5 or 6 miles from the city of Tacoma. It is just across an arm of Puget Sound.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10321) for the relief of homestead settlers under the act of February 20, 1904.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.

SECTION 1. That entrymen on lands ceded under the act of February 20, 1904, entitled "An act to authorize the sale of a part of what is known as the Red Lake Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota," who have complied with the requirements of the homestead law as to residence and improvements, are hereby granted an extension until seven years after the date of their entries in which to make final proof and payment therefor.

SEC. 2. That hereafter all entries under said act shall be subject to contest and forfeiture for abandonment, the same as ordinary entries under the homestead law, with like preference rights to contestants.

With the following committee amendments:

Amend the title by adding after the word "four" the following: "June 5 and 28, 1906, and March 2, 1907." Change the word "act" to "acts," so that the title will read as follows: "For the relief of homestead settlers under the acts of February 20, 1904, June 5 and 28, 1906, and March 2, 1907."

Amend the bill by numbering that portion of the bill from lines 3 to 10, inclusive, as section 1.

Amend the bill by striking out all of section 2 and inserting in lieu thereof, to be numbered section 2, the following:

"That the time within which all unpaid payments which have heretofore or may hereafter become due and payable under the act entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus or unallotted lands in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect,' approved March 2, 1907, except the cash payment required at the time of entry, be, and the same is hereby, postponed and extended for one year from the date on which such payments are now by law required to be made: Provided, That any payment not made within the time required by the act above stated and extended by the provisions of this act shall draw interest at 5 per cent per annum, and the interest when paid shall be credited to the proceeds of the sale of the land as provided in said act: Provided further, That such extension shall be subject to a full compliance by the entrymen of all requirements of the homestead laws as to residence and improvement."

Also insert the following as section 3:

"That all payments heretofore due and extended and the payments due, or to become due, during the year 1910 from entrymen who have made entry under an act entitled 'An act to open to settlement 505,000 acres of land in Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations in Oklahoma Territory,' approved June 5, 1906, and the act entitled 'An act giving preference right to actual settlers on pasture reservation No. 3, to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla.,' approved June 28, 1906, are hereby postponed and extended as follows: One of said payments shall be made in 1911 at the time when a payment would become due under existing law, or one year after such payment became due in 1910, and the other payments shall be made annually thereafter until all payments are made: Provided, That all payments postponed and extended by the provisions of this act shall draw interest at 5 per cent per annum from the date of such extension, and the interest when paid shall be credited to the proceeds of the sale of the land as provided in said acts: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall extend the time of payments in any case where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the law in regard to residence and improvement, as provided by the homestead law, has been fully performed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and I desire to reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for extending the time to settlers upon what was formerly the Red Lake Reservation in Minnesota. There are added to the bill two sections, one extending the time to settlers in the Rosebud Reservation, in Tripp County, S. Dak., and the other extending the time to settlers in what was formerly the Kiowa and Comanche Reservation, in Oklahoma. The lands in the Red Lake Reservation were authorized to be sold under an act of Congress approved in 1904. There was a treaty made with the Indians of that reservation for a cession of their lands for $1,000,000. That treaty was amended by Congress, and it was provided that the lands should be disposed of to settlers at the highest price that could be obtained for the lands. There was something like one hundred and odd thousand acres of land sold, at a price averaging about $6 per acre, the highest price paid being $46 per acre. The law provided that the lands disposed of after the first sale should be disposed of at $4 per acre. The persons who purchased these lands, under the excitement incident to the land being disposed of at public auction, undoubtedly paid more than the lands were worth. Owing to excessive rainfall and too much water, without proper drainage, their crops have been very light, and it has been impossible for them to meet their payments, and Congress has heretofore granted them two extensions. It appears that the land is going to bring about $250,000 more than the Indians agreed to accept in the treaty that was made. The law provides that the money shall be placed in the Treasury and paid out to the Indians in 15 annual installments. There is now enough money in the Treasury to meet these installments for the next few years, and as this extension does not extend beyond two years there can be no harm to the Indians or to anybody else in granting it; and as an inducement to the settlers who are in default on their payments, we extend them without any interest.

Now, so far as the second section of the bill is concerned, it extends the time to the settlers in Tripp County, in South Dakota, in the Rosebud Reservation, that reservation having been opened to settlement under a law that became effective, I think, in 1908. Nineteen hundred and eleven people filed on land in Tripp County, in April of last year, at $6 per acre. They paid one-fifth of the purchase price at the time of entry. Under the law there will be due on the 1st of April the second payment. They are given, as everybody knows, six months in which to establish residence. They can not acquire title until they have resided upon the land for fourteen months. It is apparent to everyone that the settlers can not raise anything in a new country the first year. It is also impossible to make the fourteen months' residence in one year; consequently these people could not have made the residence necessary to commute and acquire title, which they might do had that period of time been longer than one year, as they could have borrowed money to make these payments. The settlers have sent to me a petition signed by several hundred, setting forth that by reason of very unusual climatic conditions in the last few months, excessive cold, and deep snow, many of them have lost their live stock. The cost of living by reason of these conditions has been greatly in excess of what they anticipated, and unless this extension is granted many of them will have to lose their land, upon which they made settlement and for which they have paid one-fifth of $6 per acre. The purpose, I may say, of putting this bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar is in order to relieve these settlers. It must be enacted into law between now and April 1. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see in the report that this bill was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and that he says in his letter returning the bill to the committee that no provision is made for compensating the Indians who are beneficiaries from the sale of their lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that that refers entirely to the settlers in the Red Lake Reservation; and under that law the proceeds are paid to Indians in 15 annual installments. There is money enough in the Treasury now to meet those installments for the next four or five years. This bill does not extend the time beyond two years; consequently there will be plenty of money to meet the payments, and there is no interest provided for on the moneys which are deposited in the Treasury, so that we simply give the settlers the benefit of the interest instead of adding that much ultimately to the fund.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Was the bill amended in that regard referred to by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The bill has not been amended, and it does not provide any interest so far as the settlers in the Red Lake Reservation are concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How did the Secretary of the Interior come to the conclusion that the Indians' rights were affected?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Simply because he did not take into consideration that this law authorizing the sale of these lands provided that the money should be held in the Treasury and paid out during a period of fifteen years instead of immediately, and that there is no interest provided for on the deposit. Many of these bills provide that the proceeds shall be placed in the Treasury and shall draw interest at 3, 4, and 5 per cent, as the case may be; but in this case there is no provision made for interest.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. What did these Red Lake lands sell for?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They sold on an average for $6 an acre. The highest bid was $46 an acre.

Mr. MONDELL. And we have already extended the time two years?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. We have extended the time twice, and this only extends the time up to and including the life of a homestead entry, which is seven years.

Mr. MONDELL. When does the committee hope or expect the settlers on these Red Lake lands will be able to make another payment?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Within the lifetime of their entries we believe they will be able to pay in full.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes that here are lands sold at $6, which are valuable lands, in a country that is fairly well settled, that the Government is erecting irrigation work where it is selling land, and where the annual payment is as much as $6 a year. It occurs to me it is a little bit dangerous to extend these from year to year.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman must take into consideration that these people were unfortunate in not having crops, and they have no means of raising money except from the crops that they may raise. This has been due to too much wet, and there has not been as yet any provision made for drainage.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize there is a very excellent reason for extending the payments in the other cases in the bill, but it does seem to me that these settlers in the Red Lake country ought to make the payments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Wyoming has lived in a public-land State long enough to know something about the hardships that one has to endure to acquire lands in complying with the homestead laws, to say nothing about being compelled to pay a price of four, five, six, and in some instances more dollars per acre, as is the present practice, for the sole purpose of building up in the Treasury a large fund to possibly do more harm than good to the Indians who are the beneficiaries.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if that be true, we ought to excuse the settlers for all time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that these bills providing for the sale of Indian reservations should provide in the future that the second payment shall be made within the second year rather than within the first year. And the effect of this extension will be to simply extend the time for one year on the second payment and on all the other payments, with an interest rate of 5 per cent to be paid by the settlers.

The same that is true of the Rosebud section of this bill is true of section 3, the provision affecting the settlers in Oklahoma. These lands were sold to the settlers at an average price of $11 per acre, but owing to droughts and short crops the settlers have been unable to make their payments, and this is simply granting them an extension with 5 per cent interest without injury to the Indian or the Government. The provisions are unanimously approved by the committee and have the approval of the department.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman knows that sections 2 and 3 reported by the committee are not germane to the original bill and are subject to a point of order, but the three propositions are all along the same line as to extending the time. The gentleman knows that the question has been raised in the House here a number of times, when similar bills were reported to the House, as to whether it was desirable to open up a reservation on certain terms, and then, after the land has been taken up, give better terms to those people who had been lucky enough to get it than had been promised to those who had not been lucky enough to get it. May I ask the gentleman now—the gentleman is at the head of the great Indian Affairs Committee that will undoubtedly have a great many of these Indian reservations to open up—what should be the attitude of Congress, in the opinion of the gentleman, in the future? Shall we state the terms upon which we shall stand or will we do as we have in the past and state terms that are not intended to apply to those who are lucky enough to draw the good tickets in the lottery?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Illinois of course knows that it is impossible to anticipate all the obstacles that may have to be overcome.

I will call the gentleman's attention to the bill which passed this House, I think in 1903 or 1904, for the sale of that portion of this same reservation, known as "Gregory County." In that law the first payment was to be made at the time of filing and the second within two years. There has been no trouble whatever over that sale. There has been no extension, and practically to-day the transaction has been completed, or will be very shortly.

Now, my policy, and I think it will be the policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in the future to provide, as that law provided, for the sale of lands in Gregory County to which I have referred; that the second payment shall be made within two years, instead of at the end of one year. There is a law that was enacted, as the gentleman knows, in the last Congress opening the Cheyenne and Standing Rock Reservation. The filings are not to be made until May, and to show my position, if there is no objection, at the proper time I shall ask to add a new section to grant the settlers who may go into that reservation the terms that we now propose to make in regard to the Rosebud Reservation. The Committee on Indian Affairs reported on Friday or Saturday a bill for the Fort Berthold Reservation in North Dakota, and they adopted this plan: The first payment of one-fifth at the time of entry, the second payment within two years after entry, and the balance in annual payments of three, four, five, and six years.

Mr. MANN. Now, may I ask the gentleman one further question? What sufficient reason is there why we should postpone the payment of the amount due from the settlers to the Government for the benefit of the Indians without any consideration in the way of interest?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. We do provide for interest upon this proposition.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, yes; I will call the gentleman's attention to page 2, section 1.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about section 2; I am talking about section 1.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In that case I will say to the gentleman I have already stated the reason.

Mr. MANN. Why do they not pay the Indians interest, according to the gentleman's contention, where the settlers do not have the money? Why should he object to their paying interest for the extension?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My reason for it?

Mr. MANN. Why, when they have the luck to get the extension, should they not pay interest?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My reason is, Mr. Speaker, that I think if these settlers will pay the balance they now owe, it is as great a price as would be received for the lands if forfeited and reoffered.

Mr. MANN. That part of it does not worry me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I believe, further, that we ought to give these people some inducement.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps the gentleman would be willing to pay them to stay on the land instead of paying for it; whether that would be the proper position for Congress to take I will not say. However, I am not going to take up any more time. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call the gentleman's attention to this language on page 2, in line 23: The word "of" occurs near the end of the line. I suggest to the gentleman that that should be "with" instead of "of."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, strike out "of" and insert "with."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VALE LAND DISTRICT, OREGON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5125) authorizing the creation of an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be known as the "Vale land district."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an additional land district is hereby created in the State of Oregon, to embrace lands described as follows: Commencing at a point where the township line between townships 11 and 12 south intersects the Snake River; thence west along said township line to its intersection with the northwest corner of township 12 south, range 36 east; thence south on the range line between ranges 35 and 36 east to its intersection with the fourth standard parallel south; thence east on said fourth standard parallel south to its intersection with the range line between ranges 36 and 37 east; thence south along said range line to its intersection with the sixth standard parallel south; thence west along said sixth parallel south to the northwest corner of township 31 south, range 35 east; thence south along the range line between ranges 34 and 35 east to the southwest corner of township 37 south, range 35 east; thence west along the north boundary of township 38 south to the northwest corner of township 38 south, range 35 east; thence south along the range line between ranges 34 and 35 south to its intersection with the boundary line between the States of Oregon and Nevada; thence east along said boundary line to its intersection with the boundary line between the States of Oregon and Idaho; thence north and northerly along said boundary to the place of beginning; and that Vale, Malheur County, within said district, is hereby designated as the site for the land office thereof.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all plats, maps, records, and papers in the Burns and La Grande land offices which relate to or form a necessary part of the record of the lands embraced in the land district hereby created to be transferred to the same, and said district created as aforesaid shall be known as the "Vale land district."

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver for said land district, and they shall be subject to the same laws and be entitled to the same compensation as is or may be hereafter provided by law in relation to the existing land offices and officers in said State.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

On page 2 strike out the word "west," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the word "east."

In line 10, on the same page, strike out the word "thirty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-six."

On the same page and line strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-seven."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two about this new land district. This is for the creation of a new land district in Oregon, is it?

Mr. ELLIS. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the necessity of creating a new land district there?

Mr. ELLIS. The present district comprises about 25,000 square miles; to reach the land office it is necessary to travel by stage and private conveyance. A range of mountains intervenes between the location of the present land office and this proposed location of the new one. Most of this land in the proposed district is in the southeastern corner of the district, and the settlers will have to go 100 miles and sometimes 200 miles by rail or private conveyance to the proposed new site, and then there is a distance of 145 miles from that point to the nearest railroad connection, across a range of mountains, in order to reach the present land office. Its only object is to avoid this very great hardship, for the reason that the country is rapidly being settled. They are doing a great deal of irrigation in the northeast part of that district. In the proposed new district there are a great many filings made, and in some instances it requires attendance at the local land office, which involves a travel of from 300 to 500 miles in making the round trip by private conveyance or stage, and the settler has to make that at no small expense, and it imposes great hardship upon him. The territory is too large and should be divided. It will leave 4,000,000 acres of unappropriated land in the new district and 6,000,000 acres unappropriated in the old. It necessitates a travel at the present time from the most distant point by stage to reach Vale, the location for the office in the new land district, of about 180 miles going one way, and to reach Burns, the present office in the old district, of 135 miles in addition, to make the journey one way. So when you come to double that, you will see the distance necessary to be traveled either by stage or private conveyance. This is a district that has scarcely any railroads except in the extreme east and northeast portion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the land office at Burns?

Mr. ELLIS. There is a land office at Burns.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many land offices are there in Oregon?

Mr. ELLIS. Eight or nine. Oregon has over 96,000 square miles.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A large part of the State is settled up, is it not?

Mr. ELLIS. It is not thickly settled at all. We have a territory practically as large as the State of Ohio, which is not touched by a railroad, a large part in the vicinity where these land offices are located.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much will it cost a year to establish this new land office?

Mr. ELLIS. The officers are paid largely by fees. The amount received at this office last year was over $11,000 in fees. The business is increasing very rapidly now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much are these officers allowed to take out of the fees?

Mr. ELLIS. It depends upon the fees. I think $500 is the minimum, and then they are paid out of the fees until they reach a maximum of $3,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This will practically double the expense of the Burns district?

Mr. ELLIS. It will increase the expenses over that paid the Burns district necessarily, but it will work a great convenience to the settlers.

Mr. MANN. The salaries are not paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. ELLIS. They are not paid out of the Treasury. They are paid out of the fees.

Mr. MANN. Some of it might be saved, if this new office is not established, but the salaries are paid out of the fees, and unless the business increases, they will not have any more fees.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Practically it is paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is simply kept out of the Treasury?

Mr. ELLIS. There might be a small portion of it that would go into the Treasury if it was not used, in order to enable the settlers to have easier access to a land office.

Mr. MANN. If the number of entries is no greater than at present, it will, as the gentleman from Missouri says, practically be kept out of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The fees received at that land office now are about $11,000 a year and the two officers are allowed to keep out $6,000. If you establish a new land office, and the fees of the two offices are $11,000, the salaries of the four officers will be $12,000.

Mr. ELLIS. The people in the vicinity are imbued with the idea that it is worth something on their part to pioneer a new country. They are getting only two mails a week, while other parts of the country are getting theirs seven times a week.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there any good land in that piece, which you say is as large as the State of Ohio, that has no railroad in it?

Mr. ELLIS. There is good land there, and lots of it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will this expedite the settling up of it?

Mr. ELLIS. I think so. It certainly will not retard it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Some time ago there was a discussion in the House in reference to fees of registers, and some action was taken by the House. I have received from a register a letter that really has some meat in it, and I ask leave to extend my remarks for the purpose of inserting this letter in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was just reading the debate of the House upon the bill to pay registers of land offices certain fees which were erroneously paid into the general funds, per order of the commissioner, prior to 1892. I think that the position taken by you was correct, but the object of this letter is to congratulate you most heartily upon the amendment you offered at the close of the debate, that hereafter there shall be no fee of $1 paid to the register upon the cancellation of an entry. In the early history of the Land Office it was contemplated that an office force would be made up by the register and receiver; that the register should do all recording and work relative to the records and that the receiver should take care of the receipts. But time has brought its changes, and now the register and receiver do very little of the work, but, as in this office, there are eight clerks who do the routine work of the office, and all that the register and receiver can do is to sign up papers and give advice to prospective homesteaders, so that there is now no more reason why this fee should be paid to the register than it should be paid to the receiver. The register has nothing to do with the issuing of the notice. This is all done by the clerks and the register's name stamped upon the notice by the clerk.

The greatest reason why this practice of giving the register $1 upon the cancellation of an entry should be abolished is that it has a tendency to encourage unscrupulous registers to pay more attention to the fostering of the contest practice than to the legitimate business of the office. In many land offices the contest fees amount to quite as much as the salary, and professional contestants often take this as an excuse to make it profitable to the register, for whether there is a preference right issued or not they always see that the register gets his dollar. The Land Office has been trying for many years to discourage this professional contesting, but as long as the business is so profitable to the local registers they can never hope to accomplish much in that direction. In this land district last year, when there were hundreds and hundreds of people waiting upon their claims to get dates to prove up their claims, this office was struggling night and day to try to keep up, but one-third of the time was taken up by these professional contests, some single contestants having as many as 77 contests in their own names. They were commenced purely for speculation and to cover up relinquishments held by themselves or parties in business connection with them. As long as the register is receiving profit out of this business it is rather embarrassing for the receiver to come out and try to work against this professional contesting; and if you can succeed in having your amendment adopted so that hereafter this $1 fee will be abolished, it will do more to purify the practice of the Land Office than any one thing that I know of.

Another matter that should receive the attention of Congress is this professional contesting. As the law is now, an alien, a minor, or a person who already has a homestead, can commence a contest against as many homesteads as he sees fit. It was formerly considered that a contestant was a friend of the Government, and that by reason of his interest in enforcing the laws he was to be allowed thirty days' preference right in which to enter the land contested or sell his preference right. But that time is long since past, and now a contestant is usually some shark who makes that a business in harrassing the poor settlers, or some unfortunate person who has been prevented from getting upon the land within the six months allowed him, for the purpose of making the contestee pay him a consideration for withdrawing the contest or sell the preference right when he succeeds in canceling the entry. I believe when a man has had one homestead, or has successfully contested one homestead and did not file upon the land, that that should terminate his right to contest, and that if some poor man has made a filing and misfortune has prevented him from getting upon that claim within the six months that the land should lay there until he can get upon it, unless some honest homesteader wants it for his own use, and that in order for to contest a piece of land the contestant, in addition to the usual allegations of abandonment, should be compelled to further allege that he has a homestead right, that he has not formerly commenced a contest or secured the cancellation of an entry, and that he is contesting this entry for the sole purpose of making an entry upon the land should he be successful in canceling the entry. The professional contestants are burdening this office with thousands of these contests and are charging the poor homesteaders from $100 to $1,000 for their preference rights. There are now pending before this office 1,600 contests which we have been unable to reach, and more than 85 per cent of them are professional, while hundreds of poor settlers are now waiting upon their claims to prove up, and this office is unable to give them dates, on account of the extra work this contesting brings upon the office. I believe where a man deserts his homestead or where misfortune has made it impossible for the entryman to get back that the claim should lay there until he gets able to come to it, unless some honest homesteader wants it. I have taken the liberty of writing you along these lines because you seemed to be interested in this direction, and if you can bring about the legislation I have mentioned you will have done more to preserve the remaining government land for the honest homesteader than can be accomplished by any other legislation advocated by persons who are interested in the public lands.

There is no locality in the United States where more homesteaders come from Chicago, and I am constantly receiving letters from them begging for more time in which to get upon the land. These letters usually give hard-luck stories and reasons that I can readily tell are the truth, and why should these poor people be harrassed by a set of these professional contestants. If they could not commence these professional contests the claim would in all probability lay there until the poor man could get to it, but where it is covered up by a contest and he would have to pay a considerable sum to get it removed he probably would never be able to get out, and his homestead right would be exhausted.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

TEMPORARY WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC LANDS FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21428), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make temporary withdrawals of public lands for certain purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to aid in carrying out the purposes of section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending 1895, and for other purposes," it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior, upon application by the proper officer of any State or Territory to which said section applies, to withdraw temporarily from settlement or entry areas embracing lands for which the State or Territory proposes to make application under said section, pending the investigation and survey preliminary to the filing of the maps and plats and application for segregation by the State or Territory: Provided, That if the State or Territory shall not present its application for segregation and maps and plats within one year after such temporary withdrawal the lands so withdrawn shall be restored to entry as though such withdrawal had not been made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take it that the only purpose is to aid in the selection of lands under the Carey Act?

Mr. MONDELL. That is all.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is not quite clear enough that this is at the option of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior suggests that it shall be "upon satisfactory showing." This bill does not so provide.

Mr. MONDELL. It occurred to the committee that instead of providing for this to be done upon satisfactory showing, the character of which might be doubtful, it would be very much better to have the State, through its proper officials, make the application, and it felt that if a State of the Union, through its proper officials, made an application of this kind for temporary withdrawal, the Secretary might properly assume that the application was made upon facts and conditions that warranted withdrawal.

Mr. MANN. And may I further call the attention of my friend from Kansas to the fact that this does not oblige the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw any of these lands at all. It is only permissive to the Secretary to withdraw them, and doubtless he will require such showing as to him seems proper.

Mr. REEDER. My only question was whether this language would make it at his option. But this language that it shall be lawful seems to cover all that is necessary.

Mr. MANN. It means that the Secretary is not required to do it.

Mr. MONDELL. We thought that it would be better to designate the officer of the State as the one to make the request.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. May I ask what is the object of withdrawing these lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the present law the Secretary holds that he can not make the segregation provided by law until all necessary surveys had been made, and it often occurs that if the withdrawal or segregation is not made until all the surveys are executed, speculative filings are made on the lands which prevent the carrying out of the project. Under this bill the State may make the application and have the lands temporarily withdrawn during the time the surveys are being executed, and thus prevent speculative filings during the period.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much attention the gentleman from Missouri has given to the Carey Act——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have given considerable attention to it.

Mr. MANN. I have also, and this only applies where the land is sought to be withdrawn by a State under the Carey Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. CROIX RIVER, WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6449) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Wisconsin Central Railway Company, a railway corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to build a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from a point on the east bank of said river in the vicinity of the township line between townships 30 and 31 north, in St. Croix County, Wis., to a point on the west bank of said river in the vicinity of the township line between said townships 30 and 31 north, in Washington County, Minn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 6, page 1, strike out the word "build" and insert in lieu thereof the words "construct, maintain, and operate."

In same line, after the word "bridge," insert the words "and approaches thereto."

Amend the title, so that it will read as follows: "An act permitting the Wisconsin Central Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was read the third time, passed, and the title was amended.

On motion of Mr. MANN, by unanimous consent, a motion to reconsider the votes whereby all the bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar passed this morning was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report (No. 694) on the bill (H. R. 15384) making appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, for printing under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendment numbered 21 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15384) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, having met, after full and free conference report to their respective Houses that, as to the amendment in question, they have been unable to agree.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21419, the post-office appropriation bill. When the committee rose on Saturday, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had been recognized and had moved to strike out the last word in the paragraph ending on line 3, page 23.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask my distinguished friend from Massachusetts if he happens to know how many of the railway mail clerks were killed or injured within the last year, fiscal or calendar, and the sum of $1,000 was paid to the legal representatives?

Mr. WEEKS. There were 15 killed—13 clerks, 1 substitute, and an employee connected with the railway service. About 90, more or less, were seriously injured and about 400 slightly injured. As far as I know, only $15,000 was spent for the particular purpose referred to by the gentleman from Illinois; but there were three men, who had been continued on the rolls for fourteen months and were discharged at the end of that time, seriously injured.

Mr. MANN. How much objection would the gentleman have to an amendment making it $2,000 instead of $1,000?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I have the exact figures here, if the gentleman would like to have them.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have them. What I want to ascertain is the amount that was paid out in thousand-dollar sums.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have the report of the Postmaster-General, to which I have paid some attention. There were 354 railroad accidents during the year in which postal clerks were either killed or injured or in which mail matter was lost or damaged. Thirteen clerks, 1 substitute, and 1 mail weigher were killed, 93 seriously and 403 slightly injured. The number of fatal accidents and the number of accidents is smaller than those last year. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. It does, completely; and it agrees with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said.

Mr. Chairman, to bring the matter before the committee, I will offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 23, strike out "one" and insert "two," so as to read: "the sum of $2,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course the sum of $1,000, or the sum of $2,000, for that matter, is not a great amount to pay for a man who is killed on duty in the government service. I have never been approached on this subject by any railway mail clerk, and, so far as I know, there is no concerted plan in respect to the proposition. I make the amendment without any suggestion from them. One thousand dollars is considerably less than a year's salary. At present, if a man is injured he is likely to be carried on the rolls for more than a year or for a year. It seems to me that when we place the railway mail clerks in the most dangerous place on the train, and when a man performing our service is killed we may well afford to pay his widow and children $2,000.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he think, under this paragraph as it now stands, the widow would get the entire sum?

Mr. MANN. Well, the widow and children would get the entire amount. It is not subject to the debts of the deceased.

Mr. MURPHY. Under the laws of Missouri, if they had no children, the widow would only get one-half.

Mr. MANN. That may be true. I do not know. If so, the State of Missouri better amend its laws.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter in which I am very deeply interested, and I think the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois is right. I would like to make a suggestion. The law says that it shall be paid to his legal representatives. In many cases it is an expensive thing to have a legal representative. The legal representative is not the widow or the children, but the administrator or the executor; and as long as the gentleman is amending the matter, I would suggest to him that if it is not subject to a point of order, the amount ought to be paid to the widow for the benefit of the widow and children; and if there be no widow, to the children, and if no children, then the legal representatives.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we passed a bill in the House the other day amending the employers' liability act, and in that bill just passed by the House, in accordance with the wishes of the railway employees and meeting their views entirely, as I understand it, we provided that the money should be paid to the legal representatives for the benefit of the widow and children.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This does not say for the benefit of.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but that takes away the question of the expense. As to the rest, I think myself that it ought to go to the widow and the children if there are any.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I understand the gentleman's amendment proposes to make this $2,000 for those who are killed. Does he propose to change the amount appropriated?

Mr. MANN. Oh, if this amendment prevails, I will offer an amendment to increase the amount slightly.

[The time of Mr. MANN having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted five minutes more.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to insist on changing that from the legal representatives to the legal heirs. The fees would have to come out, 2½ per cent for collecting and 2½ per cent for paying out. It would have to go to the administrator or the executor. This can be paid as we pay to the widows of Members of Congress—directly to the widow.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Suppose there is a minor child?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Congress can do that, if it wants to.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and the Committee of the Whole House to the fact that this provision which is put in the bill here was very carefully worked out some years ago in the Post-Office Committee, and we provided then, as it is provided here, that the money be paid to the legal representatives. That, of course, would include the administrator or the executor, but that the amount should not be subject to the debts of the deceased. Now, under this provision as it stands in the bill and has stood for years, I will say to the gentleman—as we worked it out, and we spent considerable time on it—we put it in the best possible form that we could devise. The money will go to the heirs at law of the deceased. In one State it would be more to the widow and less to somebody else, or more to the children and less to the widow or somebody else, but in the law we did not try to regulate the distribution of the money as to how it should go under the statute of distribution in the various States. We left that to the laws of the State in which the clerk lived, and we concluded that to be the best possible solution of this question from a legal standpoint and to carry out the intention of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would not endeavor in any way to interfere with the work of the committee. Since this item went into the bill—and it has been not so many years ago, I think—but since the item went into the bill we have passed another act providing for the payment of compensation to employees of the Government who are injured in the various branches of the government service, and we have passed other acts or bills, so far as this House is concerned, and we have now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a recommendation of the President in his special message that we shall make provision for injuries heretofore received in connection with the Panama Canal; and having enlarged somewhat our theory of paying some compensation for injuries, I think we might, along the same line, make an additional compensation to those railway postal clerks who were killed in the service, and then we will not pay them in proportion with the $2,000 more than we paid with the $1,000, when we did not pay anything to other government employees.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is a question, perhaps, I ought to be able to answer myself, but which I would like the gentleman to answer. Do you know what the courts hold to be the relation of these railway mail clerks to the company in case of an accident? Are they considered as fellow-servants or as passengers?

Mr. WEEKS. I believe they are considered as passengers.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I can state to the gentleman what the law is in New York State. I recovered a judgment of $15,000 for a man, and I can state they are held to be passengers and not to be employees of the railroad company.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I desire to ask, on the point suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, as to whom the money should be paid, it is true, is it not, that the Government is interested in getting this money into some one's hands who has power to sign a receipt for it? Now, if this money is made payable to the minor heirs, in case there is no mother living, the minor heirs would have no power to sign a receipt to the Government.

Mr. MANN. No; I think the policy of the Government in all dealing has been to require the money paid, where a person is injured, to the legal representative.

Mr. COX of Indiana. So that they would get a receipt which would protect them, but if it was paid to the children, the children could not give a receipt.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the compensation granted regular clerks in case of accident or death from injuries? This says for "acting clerk" and "substitutes." Under what rule or law do you pay regular clerks; and how much are they paid in the event of injury or death due to accident?

Mr. MANN. This says to the legal representative of any railway postal clerk or substitute.

Mr. GOULDEN. I refer particularly to line 21, "for acting clerks in place of clerks." Now, what is the compensation or amount allowed to a regular clerk who is injured or dies from accident?

Mr. WEEKS. A regular clerk averages to receive $1,166, his salary for a year.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in ten minutes, and I would like to have one minute of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and amendments—let the Chair understand——

Mr. WEEKS. On the paragraph and all amendments thereto, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer, and unless I can get the time within the ten minutes in which to do it, I shall certainly have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can still offer the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to discuss it a little bit. I do not wish to offer it without an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] will make it fifteen minutes, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] modify his motion?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I am content to yield time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I do not desire any more time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] wished to ask me a question.

Mr. GOULDEN. A constituent of mine was injured in the New York post-office and died as a result. He was in the employ of the post-office, and no compensation or sum of money has ever been paid to his widow and children. I have now a bill before this House to give that compensation, so richly due, and I have failed, so far, in accomplishing anything toward it. I am met with the objection everywhere that there is no law for it.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will continue to fail. I do not believe in making special exceptions because the widow happens to be acquainted with a Member of Congress. If we do it at all, let us do it by general law.

Mr. GOULDEN. The man whom I allude to worked for the Government and was killed while in that service, and why should not his widow and children be entitled to it? Some general law should be passed to do justice to this class of claimants.

Mr. MANN. She should be taken care of, but she should secure it by law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, we never hear of an accident to a mail train that we do not hear that a railway postal clerk or somebody engaged in handling the mail has been injured or killed. The report of the Postmaster-General, which I called to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, shows that fatal injuries and fatalities were greater than in the preceding year. These gentlemen perform most arduous, faithful, and efficient service to the Government, and are always in a post of danger. I am fully aware of the doctrine in the matter of the employment of servants or liability to servant or employees, but that doctrine, in the view of humanity and justice, has been departed from by the Government in many instances. Two Presidents of the United States, the present one and the one who occupied the executive chair just prior to President Taft, recommended that laws be passed looking to the compensation of employees in the Government who are injured in the service of the Government. Now, we know that although these railway mail clerks occupy in law when they or their representatives are forced to go into court the position of passengers, and their right to recover for the negligence of the road is based upon the same doctrine on which the right of a passenger is based—that is, the carrying company owes to them the duty of exercising extraordinary diligence. Anyone who has been engaged in the practice of law in these cases knows with what a slow and tedious process you are met in the courts when you undertake to recover even in a case that is disputed merely for form sake. I remember the first case I had of this character, where the railroad scarcely had any defense, and after finally getting to trial and getting the verdict it was appealed to the Supreme Court, and after getting to the Supreme Court the case was withdrawn.

This is a gratuity to the wife and family that the faithful employee of the Government may leave behind him, to those dependent upon his services, and I believe that the sum proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], $2,000, ought to be paid in every instance in which a faithful, efficient railway postal clerk has been killed in the service of the Government. Therefore I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be adopted.

As I have already stated in a colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Postmaster-General, in his last report, says:

CASUALTIES.

There were 354 railroad accidents during the year in which postal clerks were either killed or injured, or in which mail matter was lost or damaged. Thirteen clerks, 1 substitute, and 1 mail weigher were killed, 93 seriously and 403 slightly injured. The number of fatal accidents is larger and the number of others is smaller this year than last.

We have already abandoned the doctrine that the Government will not pay its employees who are injured in its service. We pay to those in the Life-Saving Service who are injured a full year's pay, and in case of death, to their families; and we have provided for those engaged in constructing the Panama Canal.

The railway postal clerks are always at the post of danger and are entitled to this provision in their interest. As long as the Government has taken a step in this direction we should make the compensation at least something like adequate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, it is not a gracious thing for a chairman to oppose an amendment of this character. Still I think this one ought not to prevail. The amendment proposes to increase the amount paid to the family or to the wife of a man killed from $1,000 to $2,000. It is not intended that this money should reimburse the family for the loss of the father or the husband, but this is a fund which carries over the family until they can recover from the railroad. The fact that this $1,000 is paid to the wife does not in any way prevent her from bringing suit against a railroad company, the clerk being considered as a passenger, and she recovering for his death as any other passenger would. Therefore this $1,000 is simply a means of taking care of that family until proper restitution has been made by the railroad.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman is aware of the fact that we provided by the last Congress that those who died in the Life-Saving Service should receive a full year's pay? Now, the gentleman proposes that this $1,000 go to the family of the deceased Railway Mail Service employee.

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. Chairman, the average pay of these railway mail clerks is $1,165 a year, or about that, so that it is within $165 of a year's salary. In cases where men lose their lives in the Life-Saving Service, they have no other source to recover from. They are governmental employees, pure and simple. Whenever a railway mail clerk is killed in the service, he has exactly the same claim against the railroad company a passenger would have, and this $1,000 simply carries over the family or maintains the family until they can recover from the railroad as a passenger would. For that reason I do not think that amount ought to be increased.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course those railway employees that were recently killed in the West, in a swarm like flies, were not killed through any negligence of the railroad company?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not splitting hairs upon that question. I do not know. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WEEKS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 41, noes 35.

Mr. WEEKS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, page 22, between the words "the" and "legal" add the words "to the widow, if there be one, if none, then to the minor children, if there be any or none, then to the."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This is a matter about which I am not specially interested; but I think that my amendment ought to be inserted in order to meet the purpose as outlined by the chairman in charge of this bill just a moment ago. His explanation convinced me, and I voted with him just now, after that explanation that this $1,000 was given to the widow or children of the deceased employee in order to bridge them over such time as they may be able to recover from the railroad company on account of the accident which cost the life of the postal clerk. Now, if that is true, and will clearly be exempt from the payment of his debt, it ought to go directly to the widow, or to the minor children if there be no widow. If it were to go to the legal representatives, it has occurred to me, and will certainly occur to other Members who have had experience in the pratcice of law, that it would mean a great deal of delay before the money could possibly reach the beneficiaries intended to be reached by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If it is payable to the children, would not that necessarily throw it into the courts?

Mr. HAMLIN. If there should be no widow and there were minor children, they would be compelled to have a curator appointed, and that would be necessitated in order to handle any other estate of the deceased father. It would not cause an extra expense. If the provision remain as now, it could not even be reached by the widow until an administrator was appointed, and if no widow then a curator would have to be appointed to handle the funds for these children, and after the appointment of these legal representatives in a probate court or chancery court, we all know that that would cause an expense in fees and the $1,000 would be heavily drawn upon by the court and the court attaches in fees.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I did not hear exactly how you said the money was to be applied?

Mr. HAMLIN. Under my amendment it gives to the widow the $2,000 directly. I believe that the gentleman in charge of the bill was eminently correct in stating that this is a gratuity given to the widow by the Government to bridge her over; and if so, it ought to reach her at the earliest possible time. There is no question about the widow being able to receipt the Government for this money, and therefore acquit the Government of any liability just as the widow of a Member of Congress, when the House passes an appropriation giving her $7,500 at the death of the Member, she gives her receipt, as I understand, and the Government is thoroughly acquitted, and that ought to be true in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. When this provision was under consideration some four or five years ago in the committee, at the time when we exempted this fund from the claims of debtors, we considered the advisability of directing the fund to be paid to the widow; and if there was no widow, to the minor children, and then to the dependent parents or dependent brothers or sisters. After a thorough consideration of the devolution of this fund, all being desirous that it should go to the widow, if there were a widow, we concluded that there would be difficulty in the administration of this fund and that delays would be encountered in having the money pass to the widow; that the Government would naturally have to take precautions to ascertain who was the widow; that proof would very likely be demanded in order to safeguard the interests of the Government, just as the Pension Office to-day safeguards the interests of the Government by detailed proof to show whether the person who claims the pension is the widow of the soldier. We concluded that it would be more expeditious to provide that this money be paid directly to the legal representative, and allow the legal representative to dispense the money under the laws of the State to the widow, dependent children, or dependent parents, as the case may be. We believed then that the method indicated in the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] would have the opposite effect and would delay the payment of this money. In all the years during which this provision has been in force there has been no criticism of its operation. As soon as the Government is presented with certified copies of the letters of administration showing that a legal representative has been appointed, the money is thereupon paid over by the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the money is paid to the legal representative, would not the court have to determine who is the widow or who are the minor children, and would not the money be just as long in reaching them on that proposition as if the Government itself required it?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that in the administration of estates letters issue almost immediately upon application. The delay may be only thirty days, and as soon as the letters have been issued and a certified copy has been forwarded to the Government the money is thereupon paid to the legal representative. The relationship of those entitled to the estate is very easy of proof in the local courts, for the party entitled to this fund, if in need, may come into court by petition for sustenance and support; but if there were contending claimants to this fund, the Government would necessarily have to safeguard its interests by taking proof, just as it does in the case of widows of old soldiers, and the money would be delayed many months in some instances. The committee believed, when the matter was under consideration several years ago, that more expedition would be had in the way which the law now directs than by having the money paid directly to the widow, the minor children, the dependent parents, or dependent brothers and sisters.

Mr. HAMLIN. Just one more question. Does not the gentleman know that in very many States—it is true in my own State—if the money is turned over to the legal representative he is not compelled to pay it out for one year, until the time when he makes his annual report? I take it for granted that is so in many of the States, and the very thing you seek to obviate you are going to bring about.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know in my own State the administrator may petition the court, setting forth that the widow or minor children are dependent for their support, and the court will give a summary hearing, and the widow or dependent minor children will be able to obtain this money right away.

Mr. FINLEY. In all the years that this provision has been upon the statute books there has been no complaint as to any delay in reaching the beneficiary.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is right about that, and the gentleman will remember the discussion we had on this measure four years ago, when this matter was under consideration. We believed it would be better to have the money paid directly to the legal representative instead of to the widow or minor children, and that is still the opinion of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HAMLIN) there were—ayes 28, noes 48.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee how much of the $100,000 was expended last year?

Mr. WEEKS. As far as I know, there was expended about $75,000. Twenty-four thousand nine hundred dollars was left over from last year's appropriation, which would have been available for this purpose. I think only $15,000 was spent for the reimbursing of families of men killed.

Mr. MANN. I notice that there have been quite a number of deaths recently of railway mail clerks. The mortality has been alarming. May I ask whether the amount now in the item will probably be sufficient after the amendment that has been inserted by the committee?

Mr. WEEKS. There never has been $100,000 expended for this purpose. I should think this amount would be sufficient. Of course, I can not tell, because I do not know how many deaths may occur.

Mr. MANN. I will not offer an amendment increasing the amount under the statement of the chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $720,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster-General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car mile of travel: Provided further, That the rates for electric-car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided, however, That not to exceed $10,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise, and not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation may be expended for regulation, screen, or motor screen-wagon service which may be authorized in lieu of electric or cable car service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order in order to ask the chairman of the committee what is the meaning of the language, commencing at the word "otherwise," on line 17, page 24, "and not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation may be expended for regulation, screen, or motor screen-wagon service?"

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, there is a paragraph in the bill which provides for expenditure for screen-wagon service. In many cases it is impossible for the department to renew transportation of mails over electric car lines at the rate which this paragraph would enable it to do, and in lieu of transportation by electric service this substitute of screen-wagon or motor screen-wagon service, which is cheaper, is provided. The department is therefore able to provide for the necessities of the service with the same amount of money, and it gives them an option which way they will do it. Next year, if the motor screen-wagon service is found to be cheaper than the electric-car service, it will be provided for in that way.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will not make the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers, $1,400,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask whether the last two lines on page 25 and the proviso on page 26, being the first 13 lines, are, in the judgment of the Chair, one paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair lines 23 and 24 constitute a paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to this paragraph, lines 23 and 24, be in order after we have concluded the consideration of the first paragraph on page 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that amendments may be in order to the pending paragraph after the succeeding paragraph has been disposed of.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I will ask unanimous consent that they be considered together as one paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the pending paragraph and the succeeding one may be considered as one paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 24, page 25, the following:

"Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be used for the payment of the manufacture of stamped envelopes bearing thereon any printed direction giving the name of any individual, firm, or corporation, or any number of any post-office box or drawer, or any street number or name of any building to whom or to which the same shall be returned if uncalled for or undelivered."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I had just as lief the gentleman would make the point of order and have it determined now. I have no disposition to have the point of order reserved. If he wants to make it, I am perfectly willing, unless somebody else wants it reserved. Let us have that determined first.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, has the point of order been made against the language on page 26?

The CHAIRMAN. That paragrapgh has not been reached. Unless some one wishes to be heard, the Chair is ready to rule. It seems to the Chair that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is simply a limitation on the appropriation, and is in order. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, if I understood his amendment correctly. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska does not include the proviso at the end of the paragraph on the next page on this same subject.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say that I have not included that, because the Chair decided, just before the gentleman came in, that the proviso on the next page was a separate and independent paragraph, and therefore this amendment ought to be offered here.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand; but the proviso in the provision on the next page, I think, should be included in the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no. I am referring to the proviso in the provision on the next page, which reads as follows:

Provided further, That this shall not apply to those envelopes printed with the return card left blank as to name, address, box, drawer, street number, or building, and which only gives the name of the town or city, with the State, District, or Territory.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TAWNEY. And for that reason, before this is offered, I would offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Provided," in the proposed amendment and insert:

"That no part of the foregoing sum shall be used to print or have printed, or sell or offer to sell any stamped envelope bearing upon it a printed direction giving the name of any individual, firm, or company, or any number of any post-office box or drawer, or any street number or the name of any building to which it shall be returned if uncalled for or undelivered: Provided further, That this shall not apply to those envelopes printed with a return card left blank as to name, address, box, drawer, street number, or building, and which only give the name of the town or city, with the State, District, or Territory."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the substitute.

Mr. SMITH of California. Does the gentleman make it or reserve it?

Mr. MANN. I am willing to reserve it.

Mr. SMITH of California. I should like to say a word. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, there is no possible objection to this provision, so far as the printing fraternity is concerned. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is making a point of order in order to keep the law in its present condition, allowing the printing of names as well as the return card, that is another view of the case. I think, however, that the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is made in anticipation of a possible point of order against the provision in the bill, and while I think his amendment accomplishes the same purpose except in one or two particulars, the provision in the bill is better for two reasons——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of California. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say that I like the provision in the bill much better, but on account of the parliamentary situation, objection having been made to considering them both together or to pass this one and consider the other first, it was necessary to offer this amendment now, or it would be out of order.

Mr. SMITH of California. I so understood it. There is, however, one matter in connection with this that ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield till I make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of California. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GAINES. My inquiry is to know whether the Chair has held that lines 23 and 24, on page 25, constitute one paragraph and that the proviso attached thereto, on page 26, constitutes another paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so held.

Mr. GAINES. Are there any precedents for that?

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we ought to put ourselves in a position in order that we may be able to keep faith with the present contract for printing.

Mr. MADDEN. By what authority was the contract let beyond the time for which the appropriation is made?

Mr. SMITH of California. By authority of previous enactments.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any authority to grant the right to let a contract for a period beyond the time for which the appropriation is made?

Mr. SMITH of California. I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the contract?

Mr. SMITH of California. It is a contract for printing stamped envelopes.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I want the gentleman to answer is, how they can make a contract which is binding beyond the period for which the appropriation is made?

Mr. SMITH of California. I am not able to state exactly offhand what the law is. I understand they do contract ahead for materials of this kind. You can not run right up to the 1st day of July with your appropriation and then proceed to contract for materials to be had for that year.

Mr. STAFFORD. If my colleague on the committee will permit, I will say that there is authorization for contracting for a longer period than one year.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then I understand, Mr. Chairman, there is a contract duly executed which carries this work over to the 1st of July, 1911. Now, we are all anxious, I guess, to correct the present condition of things and eliminate the name in the interest of local industries, and so forth, but we are not so anxious to do that small thing as to perpetrate an act of bad faith in the carrying out of the contract. If the department has the authority to amend the contract with this envelope company so that the contract can be fulfilled by merely printing the amount which we provide for here, why, then, our difficulty will be out of the way and I think we will all vote for the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Nebraska. But in all conscience we ought to be careful about directly breaking a solemn agreement. The work having continued for forty-five years, one year more will make no great difference.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish the impression to get abroad that I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, or any other amendment which is pending, but I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEEKS. The Government has a contract with a Dayton (Ohio) company to manufacture envelopes which terminates the 30th of June next. I would like to ask the Chair if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, which has been amended by a substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, will in any way abrogate the contract with that company?

Mr. NORRIS. The substitute has not been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry, a question in relation to a contract. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized on his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me? Does the contract bind the Government to take any special number or quantity of such envelopes or contract to have any given amount of work done? We might very well have a contract with the concern in regard to the rate at which certain work is to be done, providing any work is done at that rate.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from West Virginia that the contract requires the company in Dayton, Ohio, to furnish the envelopes provided for in the contract as they are demanded by the public.

Mr. GAINES. Whether more or less——

Mr. NORRIS. I will submit to the gentleman that this being the contract the amendment that I have offered in no way interferes with or contravenes that contract.

Mr. WEEKS. It changes the terms of the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not so understand, and I would like the gentleman to explain it.

Mr. COX of Ohio. At the time the contract was made with the people in Dayton the department laid down certain specifications as to the buildings, fireproof features, and so forth. The Dayton concern at the same time asked the Government how large a plant must be provided to take care of this business, and the department's reply was that the supply the previous year was 1,237,000,000 envelopes, and that they would be perfectly safe in making any provision beyond that, but they must build no plant of a yearly capacity under 1,237,000,000. Now, the gentleman from West Virginia suggests the Government is in nowise bound. It would be an act trespassing upon common honesty to violate this agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the gentleman a copy of the contract here, and if so, will he give it to us?

Mr. COX of Ohio. I have a copy of the specifications, and they amount to the same thing, and the gentleman could easily have procured a copy of the contract; and the fact that I have no copy gives no weight to his contention.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care about the specifications. The contract is the final instrument, and I would like to have that produced if the gentleman has it.

Mr. GAINES. I should be quite as unwilling as the gentleman or anybody else to abrogate a provision of any contract, but we hear very often, I think, of the public being bound by some noncontractual relations with somebody. It certainly is not possible that people bid upon this contract without having some place in which to manufacture them.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I might submit to the gentleman that these people——

Mr. GAINES. These people are in business, and they take their chances as every business man must.

Mr. COX of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit me to answer on this point?

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Will you permit me to answer your question?

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I want to submit information on that subject.

Mr. KEIFER. Allow me to interrupt. I think there was no place in the United States that had the necessary equipment to fit these envelopes in the quantity that the Government required, and the contract was let to parties that were responsible, capable, and able to perform the contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Hartford Manufacturing Company, of Hartford, Conn., for fifty years has had this contract, and has all of the equipment necessary for performing this work.

Mr. KEIFER. They were willing——

Mr. STAFFORD. They had the necessary plant there, and were one of the bidders.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I can reply to your question, if you want. You are taking my time without confining yourself to the inquiry for which I yielded.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] have five minutes more. We have taken his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves his point of order on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. If that is so, this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I first want to reply to the inquiry as to this concern being established in business for this particular line of work. The proposals and specifications were submitted to the contractors December 31, 1906, and one of the conditions was that the successful bidder must have his plant in operation within six months' time. The Dayton concern built this plant and equipped it at a cost of $600,000, and began delivering its product to the Government promptly July 1, 1907. I want to call the gentleman's attention, in connection with this phase of the matter, to the fact that in the specifications provision is made as to the type of building which must be put up. It must be fireproof. It must be equipped in certain stated ways, and the specifications, plans, and blueprints of the building itself must be submitted to the Post-Office Department before the contract can be formally made. I believe that replies to the specific inquiry of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES]. These people went into business for the purpose of taking this contract.

With the consent of the committee, I want to explain the envelope situation to which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] relates. For a great many years this contract was carried on by a concern at Hartford, Conn., and I think it is significant, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated, that there never was much hue and cry about the Government letting these contracts until it moved from New England into the great Middle West. At this time the concern taking the contract complied with public sentiment in an important matter. It had been stated for years that the paper trust was carrying on this work. The Mercantile Company, the new contractor, purchased all of its supplies of print paper from independent mills in the Miami Valley, and that supply from the independent mills is still being used in the making of trade envelopes. At that time the price was reduced from 83 cents a thousand to 79 cents a thousand, entailing a saving to the Government on this specific contract alone of $300,000.

There never has been one word of complaint uttered by the Post-Office Department against the efficiency of this plant, and the good faith and intentions of that concern have never been called to account nor questioned.

Within the last three weeks we have heard stated upon the floor of this House that the Post-Office Department should put into effect a business administration. By that is meant that the policy of the Post-Office Department should be in harmony with that of a successful commercial institution. To be successful a commercial institution must secure a minimum in operation and a maximum in efficiency. But beyond that there must be further elements to work out the success of that concern. There must be good faith with every company and individual with which it does business, whether the relation be that of the buyer or the seller. Now, you gentlemen who have been talking for a business administration in the Post-Office Department have a concrete example here. It is suggested that this Congress pass a resolution or an amendment here which absolutely vitiates this contract.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. The contract with the Dayton company calls for stamped envelopes, and there would be substantially the same amount of stamped envelopes without printing that there is now. A very small per cent of the stamped envelopes carry printing.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it not a fact that less than one-third of the stamped envelopes that are manufactured at the Dayton plant have no printing on them and that more than two-thirds have printing on them?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Last year in the entire output 68 per cent carried the return feature.

Mr. GAINES. The advertising feature, or simply the blank return without the name?

Mr. COX of Ohio. The individual or firm name.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will have to challenge that statement from a letter of the Mercantile Corporation itself.

Mr. COX of Ohio. It is what is known as the "special request."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman would like the figures, as given by the president of the company——

Mr. COX of Ohio. I have them; 68 per cent. The entire output was 1,509,000,000. Sixty-eight per cent was special-request envelopes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of which the daily amount the last fiscal year was 1,200,000 plain and 2,400,000 in special requests. Of these special requests of 2,400,000, 1,000,000 contained merely the printed post-office or postal route.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I should like to submit to the gentleman my figures, which are taken from the annual report of the Post-Office Department, which shows that of the 1,509,000,000, 68 per cent were special requests.

Mr. MANN. Which show the gentlemen are only apart a thousandfold.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am speaking from the figures given by the president of the company addressed to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. COX of Ohio. And I am speaking from the figures of the Postmaster-General. If the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Nebraska prevails, this 68 per cent of the output of that concern will be cut off, and the public convenience will have been impaired just that much. This concern at Dayton, with which the contract has been made, can furnish the number of envelopes implied, at least, by the contract, but they will be plain. So soon as that is done you will have an element of inefficiency in the postal service. Last year there were 13,000,000 letters sent to the Dead Letter Office. Without the return feature it is very easy to assume that this number will be vastly increased. Now, gentlemen of the committee, I am not disposed——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you assume by that statement in regard to the number of letters that would be returned to the Dead Letter Office that this return card would not be printed on the stamped envelope if they were not printed in the district of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio? What would hinder the individual printing establishment from doing it?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Why do they not do it to-day?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because they can not compete with the Government.

Mr. COX of Ohio. The envelope trust is manufacturing envelopes now infinitely cheaper than is this concern. In that connection I want to say that I am not disposed to discuss the academic question involved at all. I simply want to make an appeal on the part of these people in the Miami Valley, who have erected this concern at a cost of $600,000, who have entered into a contract with the Government which will save it during the life of the present contract $300,000. They made it in good faith.

This contract would be disturbed if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska prevails. I am not willing to subscribe to the proposition that it is proper for the Government to be in the envelope business, and what I have to say is free and apart from the fundamentals involved. I simply insist that the Government's credit should be the best on earth and that it would not be an inspiring thing for this House, known as a deliberative body, to deliberately withhold appropriations necessary to the carrying out of a contract which was made in good faith and which has been honestly performed by the contractors. I am fully aware of the sense of this House on this subject. I believe that most of the Members are opposed to the Government making these contracts for print envelopes, and so far as I can see there seems to be no reason why the Government should be in this business, although the Post-Office Department has without variation for the past forty years insisted that it would be a mistake to make a change. I shall at the proper time offer an amendment which will not involve the main principle in this subject, but which will simply provide common justice to our people in the Miami Valley, the Mercantile Corporation, which is working several hundred people, and the paper mills in that section whose output has been contracted for in the carrying out of this contract.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized, although the discussion has been extended. I will reserve until the point of order has been disposed of as to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to let the point of order be disposed of first.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before discussing the point of order, I want to discuss the merits for a few moments.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to let the Chair rule on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman criticises me, I will not discuss it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no wish to discuss it.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, let us have a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota comes within the principle established by the House as to limitations. He holds it to be a limitation and to be in order. The point of order is therefore overruled, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. TAWNEY. The question, then, Mr. Chairman, is on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply wanted to call attention to that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. KEIFER. Before we commence, let us have the amendment and substitute again reported, because a great many of us do not know what they are.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. To this amendment the gentleman from Minnesota offers a substitute, which the Clerk will again report.

The substitute of Mr. TAWNEY was again read.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, to begin with, that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to the amendment which I have offered simply states over again the amendment which I have offered. It does not change it in any respect, and I have no objection to having it substituted for mine. That proviso which is added at the end only states in explicit terms what is certainly and without any question contained in the amendment that I have offered.

Now, I want to call your attention to one or two things that have been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio. I want the committee to understand, first, that this amendment of mine or the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota in no way interferes with any contract made by the Government, if that contract was made in accordance with the law.

I do not think it is necessary to cite to you the statute under which this contract is made. If it is made in accordance with that law, this will in no way interfere with it in any respect as a matter of law.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Why not?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer one at a time. I will yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he has any doubt about this contract having been made according to law?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not questioning it. I am assuming that it was made according to law; but I have the statute here by virtue of which it was made. Now, under the contract that was made—and I have called for its production here several times—under the contract made with this corporation in Dayton, Ohio, the Government, as I understand it, has not agreed to take any specific number of envelopes. They simply give to this corporation a monopoly, the right to manufacture all of the orders that the Government gets. This amendment does not take that away, and it is wrong to say that if this amendment is passed and becomes a law there will be no stamped envelopes printed and that there will be no return cards on envelopes. There is no prohibition against that; but instead of one firm in the United States printing all of them, the printing will be divided up among the printers of the entire country, and each one will get a pro rata share of it, and can then furnish on the return card the man's business as well as his name, and give him the benefit of any advertisement that he may seek in that way.

Mr. WEEKS. According to the statement made by the Mercantile Company there are about 1,400,000 envelopes manufactured each day, which are in this form:

Return to John Smith, Lincoln, Nebr.

Now, according to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska or the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, it will be impossible for that company to continue to print envelopes in that form. In other words, substantially one-half of the total output of that factory will have to be discontinued or the form changed.

Mr. NORRIS. Even if that were true, it would be no violation of the contract with the Government; but I want to say to the gentleman that that will not be true, because these men who get the envelopes printed by this Dayton concern, with their names and the return card, will have the same work done by the printers in their home towns, and can get stamped envelopes to be printed in that way.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me say to the gentleman from Nebraska that it costs only $1.24 a thousand for these envelopes furnished in this way. The printing in the man's own town, where he buys the envelopes, would cost more than $1.24 a thousand. If there are printers here, and I take it there are, they will substantiate my statement that it will cost at least $1.50 a thousand to print the return on them, to say nothing of the original cost of the envelope. Therefore it is going to cost the consumer something like 40 or 50 per cent more than it does to buy them in this way.

Mr. NORRIS. In my judgment the gentleman is entirely mistaken about the increased cost to the consumer. I am willing to admit that to the consumer it will cost a small fraction more than it costs him now.

[The time of Mr. NORRIS having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MANN, it was extended ten minutes.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I want first to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman is objecting because of the increased cost to the consumer, and I admit that a small increase of cost to the consumer will result, but he will have benefits that will more than compensate. At the present time this printing is all done by the corporation that has a monopoly under the government contract, and it does not print any advertisement with the return card on the envelope. If the printing was done at the local office, at the home printing office, he could have anything printed thereon that he wanted to without additional cost. As a matter of fact, as the rule exists now, a corporation, whose name is a sufficient advertisement, gets the advertisement by virtue of the return card, but the individual—for instance, John Smith, dealer in groceries—does not have his business card printed on the return card as it is now. He can only have his name printed thereon. The "John Smith Dry Goods Company," a corporation, could print its full name under the present rule, and thus advertise its business. So it is not just, as between the individual and corporation. In addition to that, there are some conveniences that I mentioned the other day. It takes from one to three months after an order is put in to get the finished product delivered at your home office. If you bought the stamped envelopes and had them printed in your home printing office, it could be accomplished in one day.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Why can you not do that now?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that the extra cost has a little something to do with it.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. There is nothing in the law or in the contract that prevents people from getting stamped envelopes in blank and having them printed at their home office.

Mr. NORRIS. The little additional cost that the gentleman is pleading for in the interest of this corporation in Ohio, I presume, has a good deal to do with it.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio, and also the Postmaster-General, in defending this practice, has said that if we do away with this practice it will increase the number of letters that go to the Dead Letter Office. I do not believe there is one scintilla of reason or logic in that argument. The man whose letter goes to the Dead Letter Office is not a business man or a professional man, but it is the person who occasionally goes into the post-office, writes a letter, and there mails it without any card on it. Everybody who has any business will have a return card printed on the envelope just the same if this becomes a law as they do now, and it will not affect letters going to the Dead Letter Office one single letter, in my judgment.

This law will not prohibit keeping on sale in every post-office in the land blank return-card stamped envelopes, which any person can buy, write his name in the blank, and deposit it in the office just the same after the adoption of this amendment as he can now. It seems to me that it is due to the printers of the country, to the people of the country who want justice, who want to prevent one corporation, under the guise of governmental support, having a monopoly of this business. Without regard to the cost or the amount of it, it is unjust that the great Government of the United States should go into competition with the country printers of the United States; it is just as unjust as it would be for this Government to go into competition with the shoemakers of the United States. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman believe that under his amendment any envelopes can be printed at all by this concern?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no question about it. There is no doubt whatever of the proposition. No one will contend to the contrary.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman to say that he would be unwilling to interfere with an existing contract, but he claimed that his amendment would not interfere with any.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to answer the gentleman's question. He reminds me of something I wanted to mention. I do not want to interfere with any contract, and I say that the amendment does not interfere with any contract. In the next place, the very provision that follows this amendment, on page 26, put in the bill by the committee, is subject to a point of order. I would much rather have in the law that provision than the one I have introduced, but by the terms of that provision coming on the next page there will be no interference and none claimed by the gentleman from Ohio. Then, why do you not permit us to take up that provision first and not make a point of order against it? The argument of the gentleman from Ohio is completely and absolutely answered from his own position.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman claims his proposition would be all right provided the clause in the paragraph that is subject to a point of order and against which a point of order is made is left in.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman is in error. We have not reached that. I asked unanimous consent to take it up before this paragraph was taken up. If that provision that follows remains in the bill, the provision put in by the committee, there will be no disposition to press this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman to agree that that provision is subject to a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. It is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT]?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, in order that the committee may not be under a misapprehension I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Nebraska with respect to the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] in regard to the cost of printing the card upon the envelopes. His statement was that it would cost from $1.25 to $1.50 per thousand. I wish to say that I have been in the printing business for thirty years, and I will be prepared to print that card on as many thousands as I could get the contract for for 50 cents a thousand or less. Unless this statement is made, I fear the committee would be under misapprehension.

Mr. NORRIS. I am obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion. I have in my pocket quotations on envelopes from different establishments who are willing to print them, in some instances, as low as 10 cents a thousand if they could get them in large lots.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Ten cents a thousand in single thousands?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not in single thousands. Everyone of us knows that it does not cost anything like $1.25 a single thousand.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand the gentleman does not want to interfere with any contracts now in existence.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to his provision expressly stating that it should not interfere with any existing contracts?

Mr. NORRIS. On its face it does not interfere with any existing contracts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would the gentleman object to that?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why?

Mr. NORRIS. Because I do not want to state a thing three times. It is already stated twice—and if you do not want to interfere with a contract, and you claim this does, then make no point of order against the provision which follows, and under the gentleman's own theory then there will be no contract interfered with.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have nothing to do with that branch of it. I am asking this specific question——

Mr. NORRIS. And I have answered the gentleman's specific question. I would not consent to that kind of an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman. I have no personal interest in this matter, either because I am a job printer, a newspaper editor, or a manufacturer of envelopes, but I can recall that for many years the Government has printed the return cards of people upon the government stamped envelopes. For years that contract was held, as I believe, by a company in Connecticut, known as the "Hartford Envelope Company," or something of that sort. During all these years the distinguished gentlemen in this House and outside seem to have made no wonderful discovery about the great injury that was being perpetrated upon the printers of the country. The Hartford Envelope Company held this contract for years, and the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] did not rise, worked up to a fury, to offer an amendment to take away the contract from that company. It remained until, in the course of time and the progress of this country, the contract came toward the west—west, as the gentlemen east of the Alleghenies call it; east, as we call it out our way, but toward the west. Before the contract had been running a year a whole lot of gentlemen throughout the country publishing papers and enjoying a subsidy from the Government, job printers, and Members of Congress became greatly excited because this new company which was endeavoring to break into this business had taken away from the Hartford company the right to print these envelopes. Is any gentleman here so guileless as to believe that the Hartford Envelope Company had had nothing to do with this agitation? Is any gentleman here so simple-minded that he thinks at this particular time that this agitation arose just of itself, without anything back of it? There were two things behind it—the envelope makers and the people who had formerly had the contract for printing.
